THE PREFACE.

HOw vnfit, and how vnworthy a choice I haue made of my ſelfe, to vndertake a worke of this mixture; mine owne reaſon, though exceeding weake, hath ſufficiently reſolued me. For had it beene begotten then with my firſt dawne of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it ſelfe to my yonger yeares: and before any wound receiued, either from Fortune or Time, I might yet well haue doubted that the darkneſſe of Age and Death would haue couered ouer both It and Mee, long before the performance. For beginning with the Creation, I haue proceeded with the Hiſtory of the World; and laſtly purpoſed (ſome few ſallies excepted) to confine my Diſcourſe, within this our renowmed Iland of Great Britaine. I confeſſe that it had better ſorted with my diſability, the better part of whoſe times are run out in other trauailes, to haue ſet together (as I could) the vnioynted and ſcattered frame of our Engliſh affaires, then of the Vniuerſall: in whom, had there bin no other defect (who am all defect) then the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempeſtuous life, drawne on to the very euening of it, I began. But thoſe inmoſt, and ſoule-peircing wounds, which are euer aking while vncured: with the deſire to ſatisfie thoſe few friends, which I haue tryed by the fire of Aduerſitie, the former enforcing, the latter perſwading, haue cauſed me to make my thoughts legible, and my ſelfe the ſubiect of euery opinion wiſe or weake.

To the World I preſent them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue others that were, (Fortune changing) ſped much better in any age. For, Proſperity and Aduerſity haue euer more tryed and vntied vulgar Affections. And as we ſee it in experience, That dogs doe alwayes barke at thoſe they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in thoſe clamours: ſo it is with the inconſiderate multitude, who, wanting that vertue which we call Honeſty in all men and that eſpeciall gift of GOD which we call Charity in Chriſtian men, condemne without hearing, and wound, without offence giuen: led thereunto by vncertaine report only, which his Maieſty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (ſaith Siracides) before thou haue enquired the matter: vnderſtand firſt, and then reforme righteouſly. Rumor, yes ſine teſte, ſine iudice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witneſſe, without iudge, malicious and deceiueable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gaue Saint Auguſtine Argument to affirme, That he feared the praiſe of good men, and deteſted that of the euill. And herein no man hath giuen a better rule, then this of Seneca; Conſcientiæ ſatisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus; ſequatur vel mala, dum bene mercaris. Let vs ſatisfie our owne conſciences, and not not trouble our ſelues with fame: bee it neuer ſo ill, it is to be deſpiſed ſo we deſerue well.

For my ſelfe, if I haue in any thing ſerued my Country, and priſed it before my priuate: the general acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than doth a faire ſunſhine day to a Sea-man after ſhipwrack; & the contrary no other harme than an outragious tempeſt after the Port attained. I know that I loſt the loue of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I muſt ſtill honor in the duſt; though further then the defence of her excellent perſon, I neuer perſecuted any man. Of thoſe that did it, and by what deuice they did it, He that is the Supreame Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: ſo as for this kinde of ſuffering, I muſt ſay with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themſelues Fathers of that fame, which hath beene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at ſuch their purchaſed glory, nor much lament mine owne miſhap in that kind; but content my ſelfe to ſay with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other ſatisfaction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: ſeeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can trauell the World without a paſs port. For were it otherwiſe; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then ſome poſsibility, to perſwade by the mouth of one Aduocate, euen Equity alone.

But ſuch is the multiplying & extenſiue vertue of dead Earth, & of that breathgiuing life which God hath caſt vpon ſlime & duſt, as that among thoſe that were, of whom we read & heare, and among thoſe that are, whom we ſee & conuerſe with; euery one hath receiued a ſeuerall picture of face, & euery one a diuers picture of minde; euery one a forme apart, euery one a fancy & cogitation differing: there being nothing wherin Nature ſo much triumpheth as in diſſimilitude. From whence it commeth that there is found ſo great diuerſity of opinions; ſo ſtrong a contrariety of inclinations; ſo many naturall & vnnatural; wiſe, fooliſh; manly, & childiſh affections, and paſſions in mortall Men. For it is not the viſible faſhion and ſhape of plants, and of reaſonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleaſed God, to reſerue the Art of reading mens thoughts to himſelfe: yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; ſo do the outward workes of men (ſo far as their cogitatiõs are acted) giue vs wherof to gueſſe at the reſt. Nay, it were not hard to expreſſe the one by the other, very neare the life: did not craft in many feare in the moſt, and the worlds loue in all, teach euery capacity, according to the compaſſe it hath, to qualifie and maske ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be alſo true, Nemo poteſt diu perſonam ferre fictam: cito in naturam ſuam reſidunt, quibus veritas non ſubeſt. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behauiour: the things that are forced for pretences hauing no ground of truth, cannot long diſſemble their owne natures. Neither can any man (ſaith Plutarch) ſo change himſelfe, but that his heart may be ſometimes ſeene at his tongues end.

Iuſtly this great diſcord and diſſimilitude of reaſonable Creatures, if we direct our [illegible] the Multitude; Omnis honeſtæ rei malus iudex eſt vulgus: The [illegible] people are euill Iudges of honeſt things, and whoſe Wiſedome [illegible] Eccleſiaſtes) is to be deſpiſed; if to the better ſort, euery vnderſtanding hath hath a peculiar iudgement, by which it both censureth other men, & valueth it self. And therefore vnto me it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worthles papers torne with Rats: seeing the slothfull Censurers of al ages haue not spared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambitiō; the seuerest men to themselues, with Hypocrisie; the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine-glory. But of these natures which lye in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, seeing Salomon complained long since: & that the very age of the world renders it euery day after other more malicious; I must leaue the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility. Eccle. 11. Nihil facilius, quam reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approued custome of those, who haue left the memories of time past to after ages; to giue, as neare as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath bin honoured; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge, That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world it selfe had life & beginning, euen to this day: yea it hath triumphed ouer time; which besides it nothing but eternity hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast and deuouring space of many thousands of yeares, & giuen so faire & peircing eies to our minde; that we plainly behold liuing now (as if we had liued then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise worke (saith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it (I say) it is, that we liue in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was gouerned: how it was couered with waters, and againe repeopled. How Kings and Kingdomes haue flourished & fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one & the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Auncestors; and, out of the depth and darkenesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens forepassed miseries with our owne like errours & ill deseruings. But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes, as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdome of God doth peirce through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of God doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalitie, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did that Heathan wisedome confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the euerlasting gods, he thinkes not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaied with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottome. The markes, set on priuate men, are with their bodies cast into the earth, and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others, doe not feare their owne faults. GODS iudgements vpon the greater & greateſt haue beene left to poſteritie; firſt, by thoſe happy hands which the Holy Ghoſt hath guided; and ſecondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkeable in the world. Now to poynt farre off, and to ſpeake of the conuerſion of Angells into Deuills, for Ambition: Or of the greateſt and moſt glorious Kings, who haue gnawne the graſſe of the earth with beaſts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wiſe working of Pharao, when he ſlue the Infants of Iſrael, ere they had recouered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in couering the Murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thouſands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeleſſe proofe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the ſame farre-off reſpects, as heretofore? For who hath not obſerued, what labour, practiſe, perill, bloudſhed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue vndergone, exerciſed, taken on them, and committed; to make them-ſelues and their iſſues maiſters of the world? And yet hath Babilō, Perſia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, & the reſt, no fruit, flower, graſſe, nor leafe, ſpringing vpon the face of the earth, of thoſe ſeeds: No; their very roots & ruines do hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta ſunt, vel manu hominum euertuntur, vel ſtando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is either ouerturnd by the hand of man, or at length by ſtanding and continuing conſumed. The reaſons of whoſe ruines, are diuerſly giuen by thoſe that ground their opinions on ſecond cauſes. All Kingdomes & States haue fallen (ſay the Politicians) by outward & forrain force, or by inward negligence & diſſenſion, or by a third cauſe ariſing from both. Others obſerue, That the greateſt haue ſunck downe vnder their own weight; of which Liuie hath a touch: eo grauit, vt magnitudine laboret ſua: Others, That the diuine prouidence (which Cratippus obiected to Pompey) hath ſet downe the date and period of euery Eſtate; before their firſt foundation and erection. But hereof I will giue my ſelfe a day ouer to reſolue.

For ſeeing the firſt bookes of the following ſtory, haue vndertaken the diſcourſe of the firſt Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impoſſible for the ſhort life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take farre off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the preſent, examine what profit hath beene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the ſucceſſe of infidelitie, iniuſtice, and crueltie; haue (notwithſtanding) planted after the ſame patterne.

True it is, that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more ſtrange) the affection of any one man ſtirred vp a-like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched moſt, with that which moſt neerely ſeemeth to touch his owne priuate; Or otherwiſe beſt ſuteth with his apprehenſion. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer vnchangeable; neither is hee wearied by the long proceſſe of time, and won to giue his bleſſing in one age, to that which he hath curſed in another. Wherefore thoſe that are wiſe, or whoſe wiſedome, if it bee not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to diſcerne the bitter fruites of irreligious policie, as well among thoſe examples that are found in ages remoued farre from the preſent, as in thoſe of latter times. And that it may no leſſe appeare by euident proofe, than by asseueration, That ill doing hath alwaies beene attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed ouer the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Iustice, vpon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossest, ouerreacht, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them al, Male and Female, Nephewes and Neeces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with aboue a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearely beloued.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such aboundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more then suspitious: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be liuing; the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeed treason in himselfe, (had his Vncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it other wise; though he caused Mortimer to dye for the same.

This cruelty the secret and vnsearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fell out, euen to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had beene tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsailours, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he alwayes tooke himselfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montague & Spencer, who thought themselues as great Politicians in those daies as others haue done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselues, by the Murder of Glouceſter; died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, vnworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disauowing himselfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents:) Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cosen Germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the fourth.

This King, whose Title was weake, & his obtaining the Crowne traiterous: who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend onely the recouerie of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake Faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom hee swore that the deposed King should liue. After that hee had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had beene set vpon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conſpiracies & rebellions: he ſaw (if ſoules immortall ſee & diſcerne any things after the bodies death) his Grand-childe Henry the ſixt, & his Son the Prince, ſuddenly & without mercy, murdered; the poſſeſſion of the Crowne (for which he had cauſed ſo much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race; & by the Iſſues of his enemies worne & enioyd: enemies, whom by his own practiſe he ſuppoſed that he had left no leſſe power-leſſe, than the ſucceſſion of the Kingdom queſtionleße; by entailing the ſame vpon his own Iſſues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reaſon could haue iudged no other wiſe, but that theſe cautious prouiſions of the father, ſeconded by the valour & ſignall victories of his ſon Henry the fift, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the deſpaire of all reconqueſt and recouery. I ſay, that humane reaſon might ſo haue iudged: were not this paſſage of Caſaubon alſo true; Dies, hora, momentum, euertendis dominationibus ſufficit, quæ adamãtinis credebantur radicibus eſſe fundatæ; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that ſeemed to haue beene founded & rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the ſixt, vpon whom the great ſtorme of his Grandfathers grieuous faultes fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-childe of Edward: although he was generally eſteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet as he refuſed the daughter of Armaignac, of the Houſe of Nauarre, the greateſt of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might haue defended his inheritance in France) & maried the Daughter of Aniou, (by which he loſt all that hee had in France) ſo in condeſcending to the vnworthy death of his Vncle of Gloceſter, the maine and ſtrong Pillar of the houſe of Lancaſter; He drew on himſelfe & this kingdome the greateſt ioynt-loſſe & diſhonor that euer it ſuſtained ſince the Norman Conqueſt. Of whom it may truly be ſaid which a Counſellor of his own ſpake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il eſtoit vne fort gentile Prince; mais ſon reigne eſt aduenu en vne fort mauuois temps. That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reigne happened in a very vnfortunate ſeaſon.

It is true that Buckingham & Suffolke were the practiſers and contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolk, becauſe the Duke gaue inſtructions to their authority, which otherwiſe vnder the Queene had bin abſolute; the Queene in reſpect of her perſonall wound, ſpretæque iniuria formæ, becauſe Gloceſter diſſwaded her marriage. But the fruit was anſwerable to the ſeed; the ſucceſſe to the Counſaile. For after the cutting downe of Glouceſter, Yorke grew vp ſo faſt, as he dared to diſpute his right both by arguments & armes; in which quarrel, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greateſt number of their adherents, were diſſolued. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleaſed God to ſtrike downe Yorke: yet his ſon the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, deſpoyled Henry the Father, and Edward, the ſon, both of their liues and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other then this, That ſhe liued to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that ſhe liued to looke on, while her Husband the King, & her onely ſon the Prince, were hewen in ſunder; while the Crowne was ſet on his head that did it. Shee liued to ſee her ſelfe diſpoyled of her Eſtate, and of her moueables: and laſtly, her father, by rendering vp to the Crowne of France the Earledome of Prouence and other places, for the payment of fifty thouſand crownes for her Ranſome, to became a ſtarke Begger. And this was the end of that ſubtilty, which Siracides calleth fine but vnrighteous: for other fruit hath it neuer yealded ſince the world was. Siracb. 19.

And now it came to Edward the fourth his turne (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaſter were rooted vp, one only Earle of Richmond excepted, whom alſo he had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward ſuch a Plantation, as could any way promiſe it ſelfe ſtability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the ſlaughter, which Glouceſter, Dorſet, Haſtings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne preſence: of which tragicall Actors, there was not one that eſcaped the iudgement of GOD in the ſame kinde. And He, which (beſides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence then he him-ſelf had formed in his own imagination) inſtructed Glouceſter to kil Henry the ſixt, his Predeceſſour; taught him alſo by the ſame Art to kill his owne ſons & ſucceſſors Edward and Richard. For thoſe Kings which haue ſold the blood of others at a low rate, haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the ſame price.

To Edward the fourth ſucceeded Richard the Third, the greateſt Maiſter in miſchiefe of all that fore-went him: who although, for the neceſſity of his Tragedie, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne perſon, then all the reſt; yet he ſo well fitted euery affection that played with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne intereſt. For he wrought ſo cunningly vpon the affections of Haſtings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as he eaſily allured them to conſpire the end, that Riuers and Grey, the Kings Maternall Vncle and halfe brother, ſhould (for the firſt) be ſeuered from him: ſecondly, he wrought their conſent to haue them impriſoned and laſtly (for the auoyding of future inconuenience) to haue their heads ſeuered from their bodies. And hauing now brought thoſe his chiefe inſtruments to exerciſe that common precept, which the Deuill hath written on euery poſt, namely, To depreſſe thoſe whom they had grieued, and to deſtroy thoſe whom they had depreſt; Hee vrged that argument ſo farre and ſo forcibly, as nothing but the death of the yong king himſelfe, & of his brother, could faſhion the concluſion. For he cauſed it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whenſoeuer the King or his brother, ſhould haue able yeares to exerciſe their power, they would take a moſt ſeuere reuenge of that cureleſſe wrong, offered to their Vncle and Brother, Riuers and Grey. Scelera ſceleribus tuenda Sen. de clem.

But this was not his manner of reaſoning with Haſtings, whoſe fidelity to his Maſters Sonnes was without ſuſpect: and yet the Diuell, who neuer diſſwades by impoßibility, taught him to try him. And ſo he did. But when hee found by Graes-by who ſounded him, that he was not for dable, He firſt reſolued to kill him ſitting in councell: wherein hauing failed with his ſword; He ſet the Hangman vpon him, with a weapon of more weight. And becauſe nothing elſe could moue his appetite, He cauſed his head to be ſtricken off, before hee eate his dinner. A greater iudgement of God, than this vpon Haſtings I haue neuer obſerued in any ſtorie. For the ſelfe ſame day that the Earle Riuers, Grey, and others, were (without triall of Law, or offence giuen) by Haſtings aduice executed at Pomfret. I ſay Haſtings himſelfe in the ſame day, & (as I take it) in the ſame houre, in the ſame leſſe maner, had his head ſtricken off in the Tower of London.

But Buckingham liued a while longer, and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And hauing receiued the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grieuous vexations of mind, and vnfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and deliuered vp by his trustiest seruant; He had his head seuered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what successe had Richard himselfe after all these mischiefes & murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion? & after such time, as with a most mercilesse hand he had prest out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords; other than the prosperitie of so short a life, as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke ouer and discerne it? The great outcry of innocent bloud, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonor, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the 7. cut off; & was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods iustice. A politicke Prince he was if euer there were any, who by the engine of his wisdome, beate downe & ouerturned as many strong oppositions both before & after he wore the crowne, as euer King of England did: I say by his wisdome, because as he euer left the raines of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he alwaies wayed his vndertakings by his abilities, leauing nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humaine actions. He had wel obserued the proceedings of Loys the eleuenth, whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like; but he was farre more iust, and begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could neuer endure any mediation in rewarding his seruants, & therein exceeding wise; for whatsoeuer him-selfe gaue, he him-selfe receiued backe the thanks & the loue, knowing it well that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were traynes that better became great kings, than great subiects. On the contrary, in whatsoeuer he greeued his subiects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How-so-euer, the taking off of Stanlies head, who set the Crowne on his; & the death of the yong Earle of Warwick, son to George D. of Clarence, shewes, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first line ended in his grãd-children as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and Patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many seruants did he aduãce in hast (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gaue he aboundant flowers from whence to gather hony, and in the end of Haruest burnt them in the Hiue? How many wiues did he cut off, & cast off, as his fancy & affection chãged? How many Princes of the bloud (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawle towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the accompt) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to haue giuen his accompt to GOD for the abundance of bloud already spilt. He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolke the Father, & executed the Earle of Surrey the son; the one, whose deseruings he knew not how to value, hauing neuer omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, & the Kings ſeruice; the other, neuer hauing committed any thing worthy of his leaſt diſpleaſure: the one exceeding valiant and aduiſed; the other no leſſe valiant than learned, & of excellent hope. But beſides the ſorrowes which he heaped vpon the Fatherleſſe, & widdowes at home: and beſides the vaine enterpriſes abroad, wherein it is thought that he conſumed more Treaſure, than all our victorious Kings did in their ſeuerall Conqueſts: what cauſeleſſe and cruell warres did he make vpon his owne Nephew King Iames the firſt? What Lawes & Wills did he deuiſe, to eſtabliſh this Kingdome in his owne iſſues? vſing his ſharpeſt weapons to cut off, and cut downe thoſe branches, which ſprang from the ſame roote that himſelfe did. And in the end (notwithſtanding theſe his ſo many irreligious prouiſions) it pleaſed God to take away all his owne, without increaſe; though, for themſelues in their ſeuerall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For theſe words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue beene verified vpon many others: As thy ſword hath made other women childleſſe, ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſſe among other women. And that blood, which the ſame King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen vp in the North, God hath diffuſed by the ſunſhine of his grace: from whence His Maieſtie now liuing, & long to liue, is deſcended. Of whom I may ſay it truely, That if all the malice of the world were infuſed into one eie: yet could it not diſcerne in his life, euen to this day, any one of thoſe foule ſpots, by which the conſciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bene defiled; nor any droppe of that innocent blood on the ſword of his iuſtice, with which the moſt that fore-went him, haue ſtayned both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England; it may truely be auowed: That he hath receiued it euen from the hand of God, and hath ſtayed the time of putting it on, howſoeuer he were prouoked to haſten it: That He neuer tooke reuenge of any man, that ſought to put him beſide it: That he refuſed the aſſiſtance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as euer Princeſſe did: That his Maieſtie entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right ſet open; and into which, by a generall loue and Obedience, Hee was receiued. And howſoeuer His Maieſties præceding title to this Kingdome, was perferred by many Princes (witneſſe the Treaty at Cambray in the yeare, 1559) yet he neuer pleaſed to diſpute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predeceſſor; no, notwithſtanding the iniury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long raigne.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulneſſe to GOD for the vniting of the Northern parts of Brittany to the South, to wit of Scotland to England, which though they were ſeuered but by ſmall brookes and bankes, yet by reaſon of the long continewed warre, and the cruelties exerciſed vpon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitly ſeuered. This I ſay is not the leaſt of Gods bleſſings which His Maieſtie hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty greeuances together, & heap them vp to their hight, thy wil appeare but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Hiſtorians ſince then, haue acknowledged the vniting of the Red-Roſe, and the White, for the greateſt happineſſe, (Chriſtian Religion excepted) that euer this Kingdome receiued from GOD, certainly the peace betweene the two Lions of gold & gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, beſides the ſparing of our britiſh blood, heretofore and during the difference, ſo often & abundantly ſhed, the ſtate of England is more aſſured, the Kingdome more inabled to recouer her ancient honor and rights, and by it made more inuincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies & conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeare 1588. ioyned the army which hee commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast, & had his Maiesty at the same time declared himselfe against vs in the north: it is easie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainely we would then without murmur haue brought this vnion a farre greater praise than it hath since cost vs. It is true, that there was neuer any Cõmon weale or Kingdom in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings liue in the world & not aboue it. They are not infinit to examine euery mans cause, or to relieue euery mans wants, And yet in the latter, (though to his owne preiudice) His Maiestie hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be said as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not vnderstãd with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of His Maiestie, than of any King that euer Englãd had; who as well in diuine, as humane vnderstãding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

Pin comment. in Sal. 1. K. 4.

I could say much more of the Kings Maiesty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of presumption, & withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnskilfull and common Painters, which by her owne commandement were knockt in peeces and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beauty of the externall: and weake writers, in describing the vertues of the internall: doe often leaue to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most perfect and Princely mindes, a most defectiue representation. It may suffice, and there needes no other discourse, if the honest Reader but compare the cruell & turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpose I haue inserted this breife discourse) with His Maiesties temperate, reuengelesse, and liberall disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them iustly, and with an euen hand: & withall but bestow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He shall finde, that there is no man that hath so iust cause to complaine, as the King himselfe hath. Now as we haue tolde the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great personages: so we finde, that GOD is euery where the same GOD. And as it pleased him to punish the vsurpation, & vnnatural cruelty of Henry the first, & of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: so dealt He with the sons of Loys Debonaire, the son of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eies of Bernard his Nephew, the son of Pepin the eldest son of Charlemaine, & heire of the Empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his eldest brother: there followed nothing but murders vpon murders, poysoning, imprisonments, & ciuill warre, till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himselfe of his Nephew by a violent death, & of his bastard Brothers by a ciuil death (hauing inclosed them with sure gard, al the daies of their liues, within a Monastery) held himself secure from all opposition: Yet God raised vp against him (which he suspected not) his own sons, to vex him, to inuade him, to take him prisoner, & to depose him; his owne sons, with whom (to satisfie their ambition)

he had ſhared his eſtate, and giuen them Crownes to weare, and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Yea his eldeſt ſon Lothaire (for he had foure, three by his firſt wife, & one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his depoſition, That he had vſed violence towards his brothers and kinſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might haue deliuered) to be ſlaine, eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus, et propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiſerit: Because he vſed violence to his Brothers and Kinſmen, & ſuffered his Nephew to be ſlaine whom he might haue deliuered. Step. Paſquier recher. l. 5. c. 1.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his crueltie. For among many other things, which he performed in the Generall Aſſemblie of the States, it followes: Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe confeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſponte eam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat. Paſq. Ibidem. After this he did openly confeſſe him-ſelfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodoſius, hee vnder-went voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Barnard his own Nephew.

This he did: and it was praiſe-worthie. But the bloud that is vniuſtly ſpilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

This King, as I haue ſaid, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldeſt he gaue the Kingdome of Italy, as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin the ſecond ſon he gaue the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys the Kingdome of Bauier: and to Charles, whom hee had by a ſecond wife called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this ſecond wife, being a Mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his ſon Pepin out of Aquitaine, therby to greaten Charls which, after the death of his ſon Pepin, he proſequuted to effect, againſt his Grandchild bearing the ſame name. In the meane while, being inuaded by his ſon Loys of Bauier, he dies for greife.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bauier, and Charles afterwards called the bald, & their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioyne in league againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt brother. They fight neare to Auxerre the moſt bloody battaile that euer was ſtroken in France: in which, the marueilous loſſe of Nobility, & men of warre, gaue courage to the Saracens to inuade Italie, to the Hunnes to fal vpõ Almaine; & the Danes, to enter vpon Normandy. Charles the bald by treaſon ſeizeth vpon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter, Carloman rebells againſt his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eies of his ſon Carloman; Bauier inuades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conſcience, for his rebellion againſt his Father, and for his other crueltie, and dies in a Monaſterie. Charles the Bald, the Vncle oppreſſeth his Nephewes the ſonnes of Lothaire, hee vſurpeth the Empire to the preiudice of Loyes of Bauier his elder Brother, Bauiers armies and his ſonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of griefe, & the Vſurper Charles is poyſoned by Zedechias a Iew his Phiſitian, his ſonne Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drinke. Beque had Charles the ſimple and two Baſtards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell againſt their Brother, but the eldeſt breakes his Neck, the younger is ſlaine by a wild Bore; the ſon of Bauiere had the ſame ill deſtiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in ſporting with his companions. Charles the groſſe becomes Lord of all that the ſonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie; wherewith not contented, he inuades Charles the ſimple: but being forſaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his vnderſtanding, he dies a diſtracted begger. Charles the ſimple is held in Wardſhip by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and laſtly being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the priſon of Peron: Loyes the ſonne of Charles the ſimple breakes his neck in chaſing a Wolfe, & of the two ſonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poyſon, the other dies in the priſon of Orleans; after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a ſtranger to the French makes himſelfe King.

Theſe miſerable ends had the iſſues of Debonaire: who after he had once apparelled iniuſtice with authority, his ſonnes and ſucceſſours tooke vp the faſhion: and wore that Garment ſo long without other prouiſion, as when the ſame was torne from their ſhoulders, euery man deſpiſed them as miſerable & naked beggers. The wretched ſucceſſe they had, (ſaith a learned French-man) ſhewes, que en ceſte mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iuſtice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the ſon of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more medling, than either God, or Iuſtice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certaine that Francis the firſt, One of the worthieſt Kings (except for that fact,) that euer the French men had, did neuer enioy himſelfe, after hee had commended the deſtruction of the Proteſtants of Mirandol & Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were thereupon burnt, and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true, that the ſaid King Francis repented himſelfe of the fact, and gaue charge to Henry his ſonne, to do iuſtice vpon the Murderers; threatning his ſonne with GODS iudgments, if hee neglected it. But this vnſeaſonable care of his, GOD was not pleaſed to accept for payment. For after Henry himſelfe was ſlaine in ſport by Montgomery; wee all may remember what became of his foure ſonnes; Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, caſt out of the world, without ſtock or ſeed. And not-with-ſtanding their ſubtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Maſſacres vpon thoſe of the religion, and great effuſion of bloud; the Crowne was ſet on his head, whom they all laboured to diſſolue, the Proteſtants remaine more in number than euer they were; and hold to this day more ſtrong cities than euer they had.

Let vs now ſee if God be not the ſame God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Caſtile: in reſpect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vaſilowick of Moſcouia, were but pettie ones: this Caſtilian, of all Chriſtian and Heathen Kings, hauing beene the moſt mercileſſe. For beſides thoſe of his owne bloud and Nobility which he cauſed to be ſlaine in his owne Court & Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Maſter of Calatraua, Ruis Gonſales, Alphonſo Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom he cut in peeces and caſt into the ſtreets, denying him Chriſtian buriall: I ſay, beſides theſe, and the ſlaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonſo Gomes, and the great Commander of Caſtile; He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Coſen-germans; his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquergues; Nugnes de Guzmã, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gutiere his great Treaſurer, and all his Kindred; & a world of others. Neither did he ſpare his two youngeſt brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in cloſe priſon from their Cradles, till one of them had liued ſixteene yeares, and the other, foureteene; he murdered them there. Nay he ſpared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Laſtly, as he cauſed the Archbiſhop of Toledo, & the Deane, to be killed of purpoſe to enioy their treaſures: ſo did he put to death Maho met Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobilitie; that came vnto him for ſuccour, with a great ſumme of money, to leuy (by his fauour) ſome companies of ſouldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needs aſſiſt the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King; in ſo much as Pope Vrban declared him an enemie both to God and Man. But what was his end? Hauing beene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-eſtabliſhed by the valour of the Engliſh Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaſter: He was ſtabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Aſtramara, who diſpoſſeſt all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniuſtice and cruelty, had neuer beene in danger of any ſuch thing. Hiſt. of Spaine.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it muſt be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, cauſed the Conſtable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Biſhops of Coſtance, Bayeux, Eureux Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Prè, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iuſtice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treaſurie, and Requeſt, (with ſixteene hundred others to accompany them) to be ſuddenly and violently ſlaine. Hereby, while he hoped to gouerne, and to haue maiſtred France: He was ſoone after ſtrucken with an axe in the face, in the preſence of the Dauphin; and, without any leiſure to repent his miſdeeds, preſently ſlaine. Theſe were the Louers of other mens miſeries: and miſerie found them out. French Inuent. in Anno, 1418.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the ſeuenth, Henry the eight, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the firſt: and the firſt that layd the foundation of the preſent Auſtrian greatneſſe. For this King did not contem himſelfe to hold Arragon by the vſurpation of his Anceſtor; & to faſten thereunto the Kingdome of Caſtile and Leon, which Iſabel his wife held by ſtrong hand, and his aſſiſtance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the laſt Henry: but moſt cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee alſo caſt his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre, and, contrarie to faith, and the promiſe that he made to reſtore it, fortified the beſt places, and ſo waſted the reſt, as there was no meanes left for any army to inuade it. This King I ſay, that betrayed alſo Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne bloud, and by double alliance tied vnto him; ſold them to the French: and with the ſame Army, ſent for their ſuccour vnder Gonſaluo, caſt them out; and ſhared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he moſt ſhamefully betrayed.

This wiſe and politique King, who ſold Heauen and his owne Honour, to make his his ſonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greateſt Monarch of the world: ſaw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with childe, with her vntimely birth, at once & together buried. His eldeſt daughter maried vnto Don Alphõſo Prince of Portugall, beheld her firſt husband breake his necke in her preſence; and being with childe by her ſecond, dyed with it. A iuſt iudgement of God vpon the race of Iohn, father to Alphonſo, now wholly extinguiſhed: who had not onely left many diſconſolate Mothers in Portugall, by the ſlaughter of their children; but had formerly ſlaine with his owne hand, the ſonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Ducheſſe of Viſeo. The ſecond Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-duke Philip, turned foole, and died mad and depriued. His third daughter, beſtowed on King Henry the eight, He ſaw caſt off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; & the mother of a Daughter, that in her vnhappy zeale ſhed a world of innocent bloud; loſt Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increaſe. To conclude: all thoſe Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maiſters of a new name; and, by a ſtrange family are gouerned and poſſeſt.

Charles the fift ſon to the Arch-duke, Philip, in whoſe vaine enterpriſes vpon the French, vpon the Almans, & other Princes and States, ſo many multitudes of Chriſtian ſouldiers, and renowned Captaines, were conſumed: who gaue the while a moſt perilous entrance to the Turkes, and ſuffered Rhodes the Key of Chriſtendom, to be taken; was in concluſion chaced out of France, and in a ſort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, ſtole away from Inſpurg; and ſcaled the Alpes by torch-light, purſued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to ſwallow vp al thoſe dominions wherin hee concocted nothing ſaue his owne diſgraces. And hauing, after the ſlaughter of ſo many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in eyther: Hee crept into a Cloyſter, and made himſelfe a Penſioner of an hundred thouſand Duckets by the yeare to his ſonne Philip, from whom he very ſlowly receiued his meane and ordinary maintenance.

Nether. Hiſt. l. 7. fol. 313.

His Son againe King Philip the ſecond, not ſatiſfied to hold Holland and Zeland, (wreſted by his anceſtors from Iaqueline their lawfull Princeſſe) & to poſſeſſe in peace many other Prouinces of the Netherlands: perſwaded by that miſchieuous Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romiſh Tyrants; not onely forgot the moſt remarkable ſeruices, done to his Father the Emperour by the Nobilitie of thoſe countries; not onely forgot the Preſent made him vpon his entrie, of forty millions of Florens, called the Nouale aide; nor onely forgot, that hee had twice moſt ſolemnly ſworne to the Generall States, to maintaine and preſerue their auncient rights, priuiledges, and cuſtomes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirty and fiue Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of thoſe Prouinces: but beginning firſt to conſtraine them, and enthrall them by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and then to impouerish them by many new deuiſed and intollerable impoſitions; he laſtly, by ſtrong hand and maine force, attempted to make himſelfe not onely an abſolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France, but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had eaſily obtained from the Pope a Diſpenſation of his former Oathes (which Diſpenſation was the true cauſe of the warre & bloudſhed ſince then;) and after he had tryed what he could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobilitie, vnder the gouern-

ment of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, & the Cardinall Granuile; He employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinãd Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gauare: & Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Bergues, & cut off in those sixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen & others, eighteene thousand & sixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides al his other barbarous murders & massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet brings his affaires to their wished ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtlety, which he had failed to performe by force: He sent for gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria, a Prince of great hope, & very gracious to those people. But he, vsing the same Papall aduantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the Generall States; & to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers, therein garrisond. Towards whose Pay & Pasport, the Netherlands strained themselues to make payment of 600 thousand pounds. Which monies receiued, He suddenly surprised the Citadells of Antwerp & Nemeures: not doubting (being vnsuspected by the States) to haue possest himselfe of al the maistring places of those Prouinces. For whatsoeuer he ouertly pretended, He held in secret a contrary councell with the Secretary Escouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, & others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny, formerly practised, & now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect & end of this periurie, & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe; after he had murdered so many of the Nobilitie, executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousad six hundred in sixe yeeres, & most cruelly slaine Man, Woman, and Childe, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden and other places: & after he had consumed sixe and thirty millions of treasure in six yeares: notwithstanding his Spanish vaunt, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milke-tubbs: Hee departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse & detestation of the whole Nation, leauing his Maisters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, then he found them at his first arriuall. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceipt of him-selfe ouer-came the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers iealousie & distrust, with the vntimely death that seized him, euen in the flowre of his youth? And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Maister both England & the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, He was at the first arriuall, & before any accesse to the King, by certaine Ruffians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warr at than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, & successe in this businesse, there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkeable. For he hath paid aboue an hundred Millions, & the liues of aboue foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none; & for reuenue, did equall his West Indies: for the losse of a nation, which most willingly obeyed him; & who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despight of all his forces become a free Estate, & far more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first beganne to impouerish and oppresse them.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poysonings, and vnder what reasons of State, and politique subtelty, haue these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD vpon themselues, vpon theirs, and vpon their prudent ministers? and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and seene an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties, as the one could neuer haue hoped for themselues; and the other neuer haue succeeded; if no such opposition had euer bene made. GOD hath sayd it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisedome of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or perswade our selues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so we neither looke behind vs what hath bene, nor before vs what shal be. It is true, that the quantity which we haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and we inhabite it. The Heauens are high, farre off and vnsearchable: we haue sense and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondred at, that the words of worthlesse men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabite, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Esai cryed out long agone, Lord, who hath beleeued our reports? And out of doubt, as Esai complained then for himselfe and others: so are they lesse beleeued, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea in the discourse of euery woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an vniuersall dissimulation? We professe that we know GOD: but by workes we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitudo non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainely there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the priuate contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murthers, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well neare driuen the practise thereof out of the world. Who would not soone resolue, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestiall habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in gesture and voyce, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues we renounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Iustice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdome, which Salomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good word; but the same which is altogether exercised in the seruice of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the markes, which (when we haue bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoote at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we haue gathered the greatest abundance, we our selues enioy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdome, and the greatest ability that euer man had, hath told vs that this is the vse. When goods in- Eccles.5.10.
crease (sayth Salomon) they also increase that eate them; and what good commeth to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuour the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde; leauing vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Maister Dannet, and vse his owne words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the fift, after the resignatiō of his Estates, stayed at Vlushing for winde, to carry him his last iourny into Spaine; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no body answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and so did, notwithstanding al the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, He sayd thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time enuironed with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domesticall seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD; which I will by no meanes go about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reuerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honor done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: prouided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the outcrie of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselues with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer bene applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer bene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herselfe rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foote: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groome beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberty.

The ſecond, is the greatning of our poſterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leaue behind vs. Certainely, of thoſe which conceiue that their ſoules departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be ſayd of them, which Lactantius ſpake of certaine Heathen Philoſophers, quod ſapientes ſunt in re ſtulta. For when our ſpirits immortall ſhall be once ſeparate from our mortall bodies, & diſpoſed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their poſterity which ſucceed, than there doth of pride in that ſtone, which ſleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other ſorrow for their pouerty, than there doth of ſhame in that, which beareth vp a Beggers cotage. Neſciunt mortui, etiam ſancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filij, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viuentium non interſunt. The dead though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the ſoules of thoſe departed, are not conuerſant with their affaires that remaine. And if we doubt of Saint Auguſtine, we cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our ſonnes ſhall bee honourable: neither ſhall wee vnderſtand concerning them, whether they ſhalbee of low degree. Which Eccleſiaſtes alſo confirmeth: Man walketh in a ſhaddow, and diſquieteth himſelfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who ſhall gather them. The liuing (ſayth he) know that they ſhall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can ſhew vnto man, what ſhall be after him vnder the Sun? He therefore accompteth it among the reſt of worldly vanities, to labour and trauaile in the world, not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wiſe man ſhould enioy the fruits thereof: which made me (ſaith he) endeauour euen to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whoſe bleſſed or ſorrowfull eſtates after death God hath reſerued? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, ſeeing the Prophet Eſai confeſſeth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Iſrael knowes vs not. But hereof wee are aſſured, that the long and darke night of death, (of whoſe following day wee ſhall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) ſhall couer vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when we ſhall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the ſeats of Angelicall affections: in ſo great admiration ſhall the ſoules of the bleſſed be exerciſed, as they cannot admit the mixture of any ſecond or leſſe ioy, nor any returne of foregone & mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we ſhall retaine any particular knowledge, or in any ſort diſtinguiſh them: no man can aſſure vs; & the wiſeſt men doubt. But on the contrary; If a diuine life retaine any of thoſe faculties, which the ſoule exerciſed in a mortall body; we ſhall not at that time ſo diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to caſt any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their eſtates greater than euer the World gaue, we ſhall (by the difference knowne vnto vs) euen deteſt their conſideration. And whatſoeuer comfort ſhall remaine of all forepaſt, the ſame will conſiſt in the charity, which we exerciſed liuing: and in that Piety, Iuſtice, and firme Faith, for which it pleaſed the infinite mercy of God to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shal we therefore value honor and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnneceſſary & vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wiſedome of God, which hath diſtinguiſhed his Angells by degrees: which hath giuen greater and leſſe light and beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betweene beaſts and birds: created ted the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub, among ſtones, giuen the faireſt tincture to the Ruby, and the quickeſt light to the Diamond; hath alſo ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magiſtrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to poſterity, for a marke and enſigne of the vertue and vnderſtanding of their Anceſtors: ſo, ſeeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggary: and that titles, without proportionable eſtates, fall vnder the miſerable ſuccour of other mens pitty; I accompt it fooliſhneſſe to condemne ſuch a care. Prouided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raiſe not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For as Plato doth firſt preferre the perfection of bodily health; ſecondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quæſitas: ſo Ieremy cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houſes by vnrighteouſneſſe, and their chambers without equity: and Eſai the ſame, Woe to thoſe that ſpoyle and were not ſpoyled. And it was out of the true wiſdome of Salomon, that he commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence, not to lie in wait for bloud, and not to ſwallow them vp aliue, whoſe riches we couet: for ſuch are the wayes (ſayth hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could affoord our ſelues but ſo much leiſure as to conſider, That hee which hath moſt in the world, hath, in reſpect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longeſt time lent him to liue in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, ſetting it either by that which is paſt, when wee were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we ſhall abide for euer: I ſay, if both, to wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of vnderſtanding, that we ſo much priſe the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and ſo much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coueting thoſe mortall things of the world, as if our ſoules were therein immortall, and neglecting thoſe things which are immortall, as if our ſelues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wiſdome, as he pleaſeth. Let the Rich man thinke all fooles, that cannot equall his abundance; the Reuenger eſteeme all negligent, that haue not trodde downe their oppoſites; the Politician, al groſſe, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in ſight of the Port of death, to which all windes driue vs; and when by letting fall that fatall Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Nauigation of this life takes end. Then it is, I ſay, that our owne cogitations (thoſe ſad & ſeuere cogitations, formerly beaten frō vs by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay vs to the vttermoſt for all the pleaſing paſſages of our liues paſt. It is then that we crie out to God, for mercy; then, when our ſelues can no longer exerciſe cruelty to others: and it is onely then, that we are ſtrucken through the ſoule with this terrible ſentence, That God will not be mockt. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous ſcarcely be ſaued: and that God ſpared not his Angels: where ſhall thoſe appeare, who, hauing ſerued their appetites all their liues, preſume to thinke, that the ſeuere Commandements of the All-powerfull God were giuen but in ſport; and that the ſhort breath, which we draw when death preſſeth vs, if we can but faſhion it to the ſound of Mercy (without any kind of ſatisfaction or amends) is ſufficient? O quam multi, ſaith a reuerend Father, Cum hac ſpe ad æternos labores & bella deſcendunt! I confeſſe that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it ſaid, that we ended wel; for we al deſire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what ſhall wee call a diſesteeming, an apposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if thoſe men do not appoſe him, diſesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske him forgiueneſſe at leiſure, with the remainder and laſt drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwiſe, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but ſay vnto God as followeth? We beſeech thee O God, that all the falſhoods, forſwearings, and treacheries of our liues paſt, may be pleaſing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our ſakes (that haue had no leiſure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impoſſible) and forget to be a iuſt God; that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppreſsions, call ambition wiſedome, and charity fooliſhneſſe. For I ſhall preiudice my ſonne (which I am reſoluednot to doe) if I make reſtitution; and confeſſe my ſelfe to haue bene vniuſt, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliuer the oppreſſed. Certainly, theſe wiſe worldlings haue either found out a new God; or made One: and in all likelihood ſuch a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth ware in his Cappe; which when he had cauſed any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kiſſe it: beſeeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it ſhould be the laſt; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practiſe of a Cardinal and a falſified Sacrament, he cauſed the Earle of Armagnack to be ſtabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be vſed towards a Leaden, but not towards the euerliuing God. But of this compoſition are all deuout louers of the World, that they feare all that is dureleſſe and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practiſes of their oppoſites, and their very whiſperings: they feare the opinions of men which beate but vpon ſhadowes: they flatter and forſake the proſperous and vnproſperous, be they friends or Kings: yea they diue vnder water, like Ducks, at euery pebble ſtone, that's but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they ſhew an obſtinate and Gianlike valour, againſt the terrible iudgements of the Al-powerfull God: yea they ſhew themſelues gods againſt God, and ſlaues towards men; towards men whoſe bodies and conſciences are alike rotten.

Now for the reſt: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poore & oppreſſed, whom we account wretched: we ſhall find the happineſſe of the one, and the miſerable eſtate of the other ſo tied by God to the very inſtant, and both ſo ſubiect to enterchange (witneſſe the ſodaine downefall of the greateſt Princes, and the ſpeedy vpriſing of the meaneſt perſons) as the one hath nothing ſo certaine, whereof to boaſt; nor the other ſo vncertaine, whereof to bewaile it ſelfe. For there is no man ſo aſſured of his honor, of his riches, health, or life; but that hee may be depriued of either or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid veſper vehat, incertum eſt, What the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet yee cannot tell (ſayth S. Iames) what ſhall be to morrow. To day he is ſet vp, and to morrovv he ſhall not be found: for he is turned into duſt, and his purpoſe periſheth. And although the aire which compaſſeth aduerſity, be very obſcure: yet therin we better diſcerne God, than in that ſhining light which enuironeth worldly glory; through which, for the clearneſſe thereof, there is no vanity which eſcapeth our ſight. And let aduerſity ſeeme what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make themſelues merry at other mens miſfortunes; and to thoſe vnder the croſſe, grieuous: yet this is true, That for all that is paſt, to the very inſtant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that we

haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all we haue reioyced; or be it that we haue measured the same length of dayes, and therein haue euermore sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, wee finde both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the woe, sayled out of sight; and death, which doth pursue vs & hold vs in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoeuer of our age is past, death holds it. So as who-so-euer he be, to whom Fortune hath beene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompt of his memory (for we haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserued eyther of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights, what it hath saued, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatsoeuer else the amorous Spring time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnualuable; and he shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heauy, secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow vp after our fast-springing youth; ouertake it, when it is at a stand; and ouer-top it vtterly, when it beginnes to wither: in so much as looking backe from the very instant time, & frō our now being, the poore, diseased, & captiue creature, hath as little sence of all his former miseries and paines: as he, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures & delights. For whatsoeuer is cast behind vs, is iust nothing: and what is to come, deceiptfull hope hath it. Omnia quæ euentura sunt, in incerto iacent. Onely those few blacke Swannes I must except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retayning the comfortable memory of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the graue without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Etsi iustus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos, And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if he had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs hauing had them; forgetting that humble & iust acknowledgment of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a foole or vngratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane soeuer his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God owes him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soeuer his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man cal the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, & beare the, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them manlike, and resoluedly; & not as those whining souldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, & appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, bene partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable begger, a begger begging water of an Enemie, to quench the great drougth of death; That appointed Baiazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Footstoole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerius so plaid, being taken by Sapores:) that made Belisarius play the most victorious Captaine, & lastly the part of a blinde begger; of which examples many thousands may be produced. Why should other men, who are but as the least wormes, complaine of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolue, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, euery man weares but his owne skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weaknes prise the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenij est reuocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that vnhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subiect: Therein it is, that Misfortune & Aduersitie worke all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinkes but the Sorrow, to saue it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato, to fall vnder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to sound a retrait, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moued me to draw the picture of time past (which we call Historie) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine prouidence, euery where found (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) haue perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almightie be so neare, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implyeth the other: Creation, inferring Prouidence (for what father forsaketh the childe that he hath begotten?) and Prouidence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisedome, haue gone about to disioyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Prouidence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Prouidence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning. Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we vnderstād, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare vp, vpō which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Naturall reason, wherein he beleeued, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marualled at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the rest) haue so retrenched their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth, and so absolutely subiected themselues to the law of those Philosophicall principles, as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they haue condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in euery question of Nature, and finite power, may be approued for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his booke of wisdome, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'authorite quel' autre, si la raison n'on fait la difference; Euery humane proposition hath equall authoritie, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the vpright and vnpartiall iudgement of man giue a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine vllo iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab alijs pecudum more ducuntur. They neglect their owne wisdome, who without any iudgement approue the inuention of those that fore-went them, & suffer themselues, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which sloath and dulnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophie, Phisick, and Diuinity, in a Pillory, and written ouer the first, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the second, Virtus specifica; and ouer the third, Ecclesia Romana.

Lact. de orig. Erroris, l. 2. c. 8.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer be perswaded, that God hath shut vp all light of Learning within the lanborne of Aristotles braines: or that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that God hath giuen inuention but to the Heathen, and that they onely inuaded Nature, and found the strength and bottome therof; the same Nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience, without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sowre Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophie, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to couer his ignorance in the least things, who canot giue a true reason for the Grasse vnder his feete, why it should be greene rather then red, or of any other colour; that could neuer yet discouer the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe, who is farre more Noble than the Heauens themselues: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discerne the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner beginnes to learne, than to die that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnderstanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action & effect telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not;

and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Man-kinde had a beginning of being. He will disable Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the mothes of the Aire for a cause; cast the worke on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternall: which latter opinion Aristotle to make himselfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatours haue maintained it; parati ac coniurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or soone after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessitie of inuincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall. Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Prouidẽtiam vnam esse consentiant. siue enim Natura, siue AEther, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex; idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Lactãtius) though vncertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence; whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or destinie, or diuine ordinance, that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Riuers in the world, though they haue diuers risings, and diuers runnings; though they some-times hide themselues for a while vnder ground, & seeme to be lost in Sea-like Lakes, doe at last finde, & fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humaine capacitie hath, & after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiositie, in the necessitie of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolues it selfe.

Lact. 5.

As for others, and first touching those, which conceiue the matter of the World to haue beene eternall, and that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistẽte: the Suppositiõ is so weake, as it hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere, They seeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: insomuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance. He had neither beene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuersall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternall: it then followes, That either this suppos'd Matter did fit it selfe to God, or God, accommodate himselfe to the matter, For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselues to the Workmans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceiue of God, That as an Artificer he applyed himselfe, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted vpon.

Eusеb. de prep. Euang. l. 7. c. 8.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wise; & no more, nor no lesse, than serued to receiue the forme of the Vniuersall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as serued to finish the worke of the World: Or had there bin more of this matter, than sufficed; then God did dissolue & annihilate whatsoeuer remained and was superfluous. And this must euery reasonable ſonable ſoule confeſſe, That it is the ſame worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing. And by the ſame art and power, and by none other, can thoſe things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which thoſe things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Againe, to ſay that this matter was the cauſe of it ſelfe; this, of all other, were the greateſt idotiſme. For, if it were the cauſe of it ſelfe at any time; then there was alſo a time when it ſelfe was not: at which time of not being, it is eaſie enough to conceiue, that it could neither procure it ſelfe, nor any thing elſe. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impoſsible. Nihil autem ſeipſum præcedit, neq; ſeipſum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth præcede it ſelfe, neither doe bodies compound themſelues.

For the reſt; Thoſe that faine this matter to be eternall, muſt of neceſsity confeſſe, that Infinite cannot be ſeparate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the firſt matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For concluſion of this part, whoſoeuer will make choice, rather to beleeue in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madnes of that kind, as wanteth tearmes to expreſſe it. For what reaſon of man (whom the curſe of preſumption hath not ſtupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of ſhadow, quia comprehenſio eſt intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it ſelf, either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if ſuch had bene Gods will) as the Sea hath ſands? For where the power is without limitation, the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea Reaſon it ſelfe findes it more eaſie for infinite power, to deliuer from it ſelfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and duſt, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionyſius his words; Deus in vna exiſtentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Eſſe omnium eſt ipſa Diuinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, cauſaliter, or in better tearmes, non tanquam forma, ſed tanquam cauſa vniuerſalis. Neither hath the world vniuerſall cloſed vp all of GOD: For the moſt part of his workes (ſayth Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wiſedome be opened, by the glorious worke of the world: which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And heereof it comes; That wee ſeldome entitle GOD the all-ſhewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able. c. 16. v. 21.

But now for thoſe, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not ſo ſaluage therein, as thoſe are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmatiue; and the making, impoſed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But ſeeing their great Doctor Ariſtotle himſelfe confeſſeth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quaſi quoddam rerum principium, ipſumq; infinitum, That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the ſame to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius eſt nullum, ſed ipſum omnium cernitur eſſe principium, ac omnia complecti ac regere. It is ſtrange that this Philoſopher, with his followers ſhould rather make choice out of falſhood, to conclude falſly; than out of truth, to reſolue truly. For if wee compare the world Vniuerſall, and all the Stoic. Epiſt. l. 3. c. 9. ex Ariſt. phyſ. 3. 10.

vnmeasurable Orbes of Heauen, and those marueilous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which himselfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionē) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, & Empedocles, cal the world vniuersal, but particulam Vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuersality and the infinity it selfe; & Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to proue the worlds eternity, vrgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient & effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring that God being for euer a sufficient and effectuall cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue bene for euer, to wit, the world vniuersal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to cōfesse a sufficient and effectuall cause of the world, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent; & the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion; to make God free in power, & bound in wil; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolue of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor vnderstanding; which cannot but worke matter being present; as fire, to burne things combustible. Againe he thus disputeth, That euery Agent which can worke, and doth not worke: if it afterward worke, it is either thereto moued by it selfe, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to Act. But God (sayth he) is immoueable, and is neither moued by himselfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the same, doth alwayes worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by God, that he was for euer the cause thereof; and therefore eternall. The answere to this is very easie; For that Gods performing in due time that, which he euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answere, in it selfe sufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be sayd to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, spiritualem mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idæa and Creation in time.

Mar. Ficin. de immort. Anim. l. 18. c. 1.

Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus. That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the sampler of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was æqually ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer shalbe. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting; and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for euer to come. The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no other wise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shalbe a new Heauen and a new Earth; without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not vnworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternall and vnchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth,

That

That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, & knit to the Diuine Being, by an individual & inseparable power, flowing from diuine vnity; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue, and preserue the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (sayth he) is not capable of, but receiueth it from the diuine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successiuely euery moment by litle & litle; euen as the whole Material World is not altogether, but the abolished parts are departed by smal degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same smal degrees succeed; as the shadow of a tree in a Riuer, seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renued, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall deny that euer it shall haue any end, and to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer seene, no not by any reason perceiued, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the older by continuance; or in any sort other wise than they were; which had they beene subiect to finall corruption, some change would haue bene discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceiued, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they will continue for euer as they are. And if coniecturall arguments may receiue answer by coniectures: it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sunnes heate, neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, nauigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate, and the Sea, ouer which we Nauigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Sunnes violent heate.

Arist. Met. 2. Plin. l. 2. c. 8. Strab. l. 3. Beda de ratione tem. 11. c. 32. Thom. 1. p. q. 102. art. 2.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certaine, That stone-wals, of matter moldring and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged vp out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue bene buried by the generall floud; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleeued, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mynes, and Rockes, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times haue not inuaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we looke for in Caelestiall and quintessentiall bodies? And yet we haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We haue neither Gyants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue, which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface, would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of proofe; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answere that can be made to this obiection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cauſe, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehenſible wiſedome, but that euery Nature had bene alike eternall: and Man more rationall than euery other Nature: Why had not the eternall reaſon of Man prouided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all? why ſhould heauenly bodies liue for euer; and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gaue Order that it ſhould hang in the Aire: that the Sunne ſhould trauaile betweene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed thoſe bounds, nor faile to performe that Progreſſe once in euery yeare: the Moone to liue by borrowed light: the firſt Stars (according to common opinion) to be faſtned like Nailes in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleaſure? Or if none of theſe had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Loue, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within thoſe two Circles, hath viſited, giuen light vnto, and releiued all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this courſe in all eternity: He may iuſtly be called eternall Charity, and euerlaſting Loue. The ſame may be ſayd of all the Stars: who being all of them moſt large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may alſo be called eternall vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and begger; and man of all other the moſt miſerable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleeue againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than euer Heſiodus dreamt of. But in ſteed of this mad folly, we ſee it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reaſon diſcerne it better; That the Sun, Moone, Stars, & the Earth, are limited, bounded, and conſtrained: themſelues they haue not conſtrained, nor could. Omne determinatum cauſam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit. Euery thing bounded hath ſome efficient cauſe, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the ſchoole of Ariſtotle hath both commended many errours vnto vs, and ſought alſo thereby to obſcure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, ſhining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: ſo if the beſt definition be taken out of the ſecond of Ariſtotles phyſicks, or primo de Cœlo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphyſicks; I ſay that the beſt is but nominall, and ſeruing onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academicks open better; when they call it A Seminary ſtrength, infuſed into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the firſt place to Prouidence, the ſecond to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderſtand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia prodiens; Natura poſtremum. *But be it what he will, or be it any of theſe (*God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderſtanding (both which are neceſſarily in the cauſe of all things) no man hath a vowed. For this is vnanſwerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut ſcientiam, He only can be ſaid to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the wil and ſcience of Nature, are in theſe words truely expreſt by Ficinus: Poteſt vbiq; Natura, vel per diuerſa media, vel ex diuerſis materijs, diuerſa facere: ſublata vero mediorũ materiarumq; diuerſitate, vel vnicũ, vel ſimi-

limum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diuersity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heauen and Earth, it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne, reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to gouerne: without which all things had bene but one and the same: all of the matter of Heauen; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this vnderstanding, this counsaile, reason, and power; Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men haue notion, and giue the first and highest place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnesq; summum locum diuino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

Arist. l. 1. de Cælo, c. 3. T. 22.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in termes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his owne will, and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honor and dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that cõmandeth al: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God, that doth good vnto al, knowing and louing the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but is neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it selfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things, in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heauy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the salt Sea? Shall we termes it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things worke as they do (call it by Forme, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they worke by an impulsion, which they cannot resist, or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lyes the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath, doth yet worke all things to their last and vttermost perfection. And therefore euery reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith, and Reason, without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which haue bene deliuered by diuine letters, as the waters of a running riuer do ſucceſſiuely purſue each other frō the firſt fountaines.

This much I ſay it is, that Reaſon it ſelfe hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio ſequitur: quia prius eſt Deum ſcire, conſequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion followes: because it is first to know God, and then to worſhip him. This Sapience Plato calleth abſoluti boni ſcientiam, The ſcience of the abſolute good: and another, ſcientiam rerum primarum, ſempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (ſayth Iſidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reaſon and examples perſwaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, ſed ratione & exemplis ſuadetur. I confeſſe it, That to enquire further, as of the eſſence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world: Or of his ſecret iudgement, and the cauſes; is not an effect of Reaſon: Sed cum ratione inſaniunt, but they grow mad with reaſon, that inquire after it: For as it is no ſhame nor diſhonor (ſaith a French Author) de faire arreſt au but qu'on naſceu ſurpaſſer, For a man to reſt himſelfe there, where he finds it impoßible to paſſe on further: ſo whatſoeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reaſon, it acknowledgeth it to be ſo; as vnderſtanding it ſelf not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that beſt knowes the end of his own Art. For ſeeing both Reaſon & Neceßity teach vs (Reaſon, which is pars diuini ſpiritus in corpus humanum merſi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and ſeeing the ſame Reaſon and Neceßity make vs know, that the ſame infinite power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs: our beleefe her of is not weakned, but greatly ſtrengthened, by our ignorance, becauſe it is the ſame Reaſon that tels vs, That ſuch a Nature cannot be ſaid to be God, that can be in all conceiued by man.

Laſt. l. 4. c. 4. de vera Sapientia.

Iſaac de defin.

Quod eſt infinitum & non ſecundum naturam terminatū non continetur à ſcientia. Ariſt. poſter.

I haue bene already ouer-long, to make any large diſcourſe either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuſe: eſpecially in the excuſe of this or that paſſage; ſeeing the whole is exceeding weak and defectiue. Among the groſſeſt, the vnſutable diuiſion of the bookes, I could not know how to excuſe, had I not bene directed to inlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the firſt part finiſhed. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euenly of thoſe things, which are ſubiect to number and meaſure. For the reſt, it ſutes well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which ſpeake too much, and yet ſay little; Ipſi nobis furto ſubducimur; We are ſtollen away from our ſelues, ſetting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet ſhall it not lay hold on me, becauſe I beleeue as he doth; that who ſo thinkes himſelfe the wiſeſt man, is but a poore and miſerable ignorant. Thoſe that are the beſt men of war, againſt all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keepe the ſtrongeſt guards againſt themſelues, to defend them from themſelues, from ſelfe loue, ſelfe eſtimation, and ſelfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counſaile from the Argument. For of the Aſſyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take vp the firſt part, and were the firſt great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of poſterity. ſome few enterpriſes, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the ſtory of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that ouercame the conſuming diſeaſe of time, and preſerued it ſelfe, from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot vp here and there in the same time; I am driuen to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appeare here and there floting in the great gulfe of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inuentions therein found, and from them deriued to vs; though most of the Authors Names, haue perished in so long a Nauigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Gouernment; they had Kingly rule, Nobility, Policy in war, Nauigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a generall History we should haue left a great deale of Nakednes, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is that I haue made also many others: which if they shall be layd to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing we digresse in all the wayes of our liues: yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their liues & actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of History, and of the Kindes. The same hath bene taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater breuity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and euery day preacht vnto vs. But we still make large digressions: yea, the teachers themselues doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldæans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance then were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilest it so florished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereunto. The like obseruance was to be vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affaires of Rome, whē the Romans grew more mighty thē the Greekes.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was knowne of them from their seuerall beginnings, in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them vp. And herein I haue followed the best Geographers; who seldome giue names to those small brookes, whereof many, ioyned together, make great Riuers; till such time as they become vnited, and run in maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weake, & the Stile not euery where like it self; the first shewes their legitimation and true Parent; the second will excuse it selfe vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili auena, vsed stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be layd to my charge that I vse diuers Hebrew words in my first booke, and elsewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in latine Caracter in S. Senensis; and of the rest I haue borrowed the interpretatiō of some of my friends. But say I had bin beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondred at, hauing had a eleuen yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; Howsoeuer, I know that it will be sayd by many, That I might haue bene more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times, hauing bene permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answere, that whosoeuer in writing a moderne History, shall follow truth too neare the heeles, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and seruants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himselfe: and he that walkes after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course Temper or Baseneſſe. It is true, that I neuer trauailed after mens opinions, when I might haue made the best vse of them: and I haue now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreame ambition, or extreame cowardise, or both, do yet, (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, betweene the bed and the graue. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and taxe the vices of those that are yet liuing, in their persons that are long since dead; and haue it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainely if there be any, that finding themselues spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting thē ouer anew; they shall therin accuse thēselues iustly, & me falsly.

For I protest before the Maiesty of God, That I malice no man vnder the Sun. Impoßible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselues, or so assured of themselues, by reason of their subiection to their priuate passions; but that they seeme diuers persons in one & the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Vnus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolutiō of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the seruice of that ineſtimable Prince Henry, the succeſſiue hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I vndertooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amiſſe. It is now left to the world without a Maister: from which al that is presented, hath receiued both blowes and thankes, Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicij, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present aduersity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; & therefore haue not far to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall priuation there is no receſſion to habit; so it is seldome seene in the priuation politique. I do therefore forbeare to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promiſe a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases; yet shall we euermore be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion, al the hope I haue lies in this. That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Loue towards them, and well-deseruing of them, than euer I shall do againe. For had it beene otherwiſe, I should hardly haue had this leiſure, to haue made my selfe a foole in print.

How it is to be vnderstood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.

Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne; and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there bee any Cristaline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme, the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

§. XI.

Of Fate, and that the Starrs haue great influence: and that their operation may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

§. XIII.

Of Prouidence.

§. XIIII.

Of Predestination.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, & against Reason and Prouidence.

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation; and of Gods rest.

§. I.

OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

§. III.

Of our base and frailc bodies: and that the care thereof, should yeelde to the immortall Soule.

§. IIII.

Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

§. V.

That Man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himselfe.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the vniuersall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

THat the seate of Paradise is greatly mistaken, and that it is no maruel that men should erre.

§. II.

A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

§. IIII.

Why it should bee needefull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V.

That the Floud hath not vtterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hilles in the Earth.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought, making the Ocean to bee the Fountaine of those foure Riuers.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher then the middle Region of the ayre.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlesyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

§. X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: And that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Riuers to rise from one streame.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soyle, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

§. XIII.

Of the riuer Gehon, and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Æthiopia for Cush, 2. Chron. 21.16.

§. XV.

A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two cheefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

THat the Tree of Life was a material tree: and in what sense it is to bee taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruite, is made subiect to death.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not vnwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

§. IIII.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the story of Adams sinne.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers Memorable things betweene the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

OF the cause and reuenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

§. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

§. IIII.

Of the diuersities in the Age of the Patriarchs, when they begat their children.

§. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarches: and some of late memory.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Floud.

§. VII.

Of the men of Warre before the Floud.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickely rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World: and of the Reliks of Truth touching these auncient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

THat in old corruptions we may find some signes of more ancient truth.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselues were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Ægyptians.

§. III.

That in processe of time these lesser errours drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Ægyptians.

§. IIII.

That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Ægyptians and others, the first Idols & Fables were inuented: & that the first Iupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.

Of the three cheefest Iupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme, and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder Iulian miraculously confounded.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill, to maintaine his Kingdome.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Floud.

§. I.

OF Gods forewarning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Floud.

§. II.

Of the floud in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Floud.

§. III.

Of Deucalions floud: and that this was not Noahs Floud: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall floud.

§. IIII.

Of some other Records testifying the Vniuersall Floud: and of two ancient Deluges in Ægypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.

That the Floud of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue bene foreseene by the starres.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the vniuersall Floud: and what are Cataractæ Cœli, Gen. 7. v. 11.

§. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made; the matter, fashion, and name.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacity.

§. X.

That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill

Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East Indies and Scythia.

†. I.

A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the vse of this question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the Hilles of Armenia.

†. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so nere a place as Armenia.

†. IIII.

The second Argument; That the Easterne people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

†. V.

The third Argument; From the wonderfull resistance which Semiramis *found in the East-*Indies.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument, From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

†. VII.

Of the senseleſſe Opinion of Annius, the Commenter vpon Berosus, That the Arke rested vpon Montes Caspij in Armenia; & yet vppon Gordiæi, which are three hundered miles distant also in Armenia, & yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.

The fift Argument; The Vine must grow Naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

Answere to an obiection out of the wordes of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole Earth.

†. X.

An answer to the Obiection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia: & the heighth of the Hils there.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hils than the Armenian.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia vnto the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marualle, that the same ledge of hils running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all a-long, and euen in India, bee called Ararat.

†. XIIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi, and toward the East Indies, and of other excellencies of the soile.

†. XV.

✕ The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first Planting of Nations after the Floud: and of the Sonnes of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Iaphet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

W Hether Shem and Ham were elder then Iaphet.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and, that the knowne great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

§. III.

✕ Of the Iles of the Gentiles in Iaphets portion: of Berosus his too speedie seating Gomer the sonne of Iaphet in Italie; and another of Iaphets sonnes Tubal, in Spaine: and also of the Antiquitie of Longinque Nauigation.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezech. Chap. 38, 39.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Ianus was Noah.

§. VI.

That Gomer also, and his Son Togorma, of the Posterity of Iaphet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spred Westward into Europe, & Northward into Sarmatia.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iaphet, and of Mesch, of Aram, & Meshech of Iaphet.

§. VIII.

Of Ascanez and Riphath, the two Elder sonnes of Gomer.

Of the foure sons of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

§. X.

§. X.

That the seate of Chush, the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, & ill translations of Scripture, grounded vpon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

OF Iosephus his Tale of an Æthiopesse, wife to Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seate of Chush.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

†. III

Chush ill expounded for Æthiopia. Ezechiel 29.10.

†. IIII.

*Another place of Ezechiel, chap.*30. *v.*9. in like manner mistaken.

†. V.

A place, Esay 18.*v.*1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Æthiopia.

†. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa, are vnaduisedly made Æthiopians.

†. VII.

A further exposition of the place, Esay 18 1.

§. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Ægypt.

†. I.

THat Mizraim the chiefe Planter of Ægypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

†. II.

Of the time, about which the name of Ægypt began to be knowne: and of the Ægyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their Antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antihuity of the Ægyptians.

†. IIII.

Against Pererius, That it is not vnlikely, but that Ægypt was peopled within two hundred yeeres after the Creation: at least, that both it, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the Flaud.

†. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Genes.10. vers.2 whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

†. VII.

A conclusion, resoluing of that which is most likely, touching the Ægyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut, another son of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.

OF the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

†. III.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Heuites, & Harkites.

†. V.

Of Sini and Aruadi.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

§. XIII.

Of the sonnes of Chush, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

†. I.

THat the most of the sons of Chush, were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Iob: and of the Queen that came to Salomon.

†. II.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to haue been seated in the west Æthiopia, disprooued out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

§. XIIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, chap.9. *v.*7.

§. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.

OF Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his sonnes.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sons of Heber, &c.

†. IIII.

Of the sons of Ioctan, the other son of Heber

†. V.

Of Ophir, one of Ioctans sons, and of Peru: and of that voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan; with a conclusion of this Discourse, touching the Plantation of the World.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and eſtabliſhing of Gouernment.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the firſt Gouernement vnder the eldeſt of families to Regall, and from Regall abſolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

§. II.

Of the three commendable ſorts of Gouernment, with their oppoſites: & of the degrees of humane ſociety.

§. III.

Of the good Gouernment of the firſt Kings.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about thoſe times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the firſt after the flood that reigned like Soueraign Lord: and that his beginning ſeemeth to haue bene of iuſt authority.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three diſtinct perſons.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Aſſur, built Niniuie: and that it is probable out of Eſay 23, 13. that Aſſur built Vr of the Chaldees.

§. IIII.

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

§. V.

That we are not to meruaile how ſo many kingdoms could be erected about theſe times: and of Vexoris of Ægypt; and of Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affine vnto it.

§. VII.

Of the worſhipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.

Of the Warres of Ninus: and laſtly, of his Warre againſt Zoroaſter.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaſter, ſuppoſed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magicke Arts; and of diuers kindes of Magicke.

§. I.

That Zoroaſter was not Cham, nor the firſt Inuenter of Aſtrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magitians of this name.

§. II.

Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the auncient Magicke is not to be condemned; though the Deuill here, as in other kinds, hath ſought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

§. IIII.

That Daniels miſliking Nabuchodonoſors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iuſtifie all their practices.

§. V.

The abuſe of things, which may bee found in all kindes, is not to condemne the right vſe of them.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kinds of vnlawfull Magick.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Deuill ſeemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raiſed from the dead, by the power of the deuill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paraghraphs, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Floud, and not in the yeere 352.

§. III.

The answere to one of the Obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one iourney out of Mesopotomia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

§. IIII.

The answere to another of the Obiections proposed, shewing that it was not vnlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

§. V.

The answere to two more of the obiections, shewing that wee may haue certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though wee make not Abraham the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two Brethren should bee specified.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Ge. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons, proouing that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more vnprobable.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

§. X.

Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to haue bin King, lyes betweene Cœlesyria, and Arabia Petræa.

§. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the cheefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselues, and so retayned the names of the countries whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE BEGINNING, AND first Ages of the same, from the Creation, vnto ABRAHAM.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preseruation of the World.

§. I.

That the inuisible God is seene in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power vneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie inuisible; an Vnderstanding, which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute pureneſse and simplicitie; was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which Hee imbraceth, filleth, and sustayneth) we behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heauen, we perceiue a shadow of his diuine Countenance; in his mercifull prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World vniuersall, by the absolute Arte of his owne Word, his Power and Almightinesse; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discerne per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and varietie of Celestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuersities; Celestiall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approch to the knowledge of the Omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almightie Mouer.

In these more then wonderfull works, God (saith Hugo) speaketh vnto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that liue, witnesse in themselues; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules: for according to S. GREGORY, Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Euery man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob,) which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspicere in creaturis, To discerne him in his prouidence by his Creatures. That God hath beene otherwise seene, to wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my vnderstanding, ding, grounded on these places of S. Iohn, and S. Paul, Yee haue not heard his voice at any time, neither haue yee seene his shape. And againe, Whom neuer man saw, nor can see.

And this, I am sure, agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicitie, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, idipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoeuer name that is to be called which is God, whatsoeuer that be, the same cannot be corporally perceiued. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostome, Gregory Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Euaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authoritie. But by his owne Word, and by this visible World, is God perceiued of men, which is also the vnderstood language of the Almightie, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters, are the vnnumbred Starres, the Sunne and Moone, written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those liuing Creatures, and Plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned CVSANVS, Mundus vniuersus nihil aliud est, quàm Deus explicatus; The World vniuersall, is nothing else but God expresst. And the inuisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seene by creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, then his owne Will, no other matter then his owne Power, no other workman then his owne Word, no other consideration then his owne infinite Goodnesse. The example and patterne of these his Creatures, as hee beheld the same in all eternitie in the abundance of his owne loue, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his vnchanged Will mooued, by his high Wisedome disposed, and by his almightie Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to loue God, Ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds creation: Neq; enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosciq; potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ factæ sunt, quæq; fiunt & gubernantur obseruatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (saith Montanus) but either by the obseruing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and gouerne, or else by the Word of God himselfe.

A. Mont. Nat. Hist. fol. 7.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the world to haue beene created by God.

THis worke and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by diuers termes, and in a different manner expresst, I meane all those who are entitled by S. AVGVSTINE, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest iudgement and vnderstanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium vniuersorum; The originall of the vniuersall: to whom hee giueth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renouatio. And wherein hee truely, with S. Paul, casteth vpon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by Gods almightie Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) tooke the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in Saint Paul it is vsed) Omnia ex vno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused, or produced out of one fire.

Herm. in Pimandro, & in sermone sacro. Deut. 4. 24. Heb 12. 19.

So did Orpheus plainely teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; whose remarkeable words are thus conuerted: Cùm abscondisset omnia Iupiter summus, deindè in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense; When great Iupiter had hidden all things in himselfe; working out of the loue of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Orph. de sum. Ioue.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Vnus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. PLATO calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the vniuersall; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Vid. cap. 6.

Now, although the curiositie of some men haue found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinitie: (it being true, that the Scripture hath hath not want of any forraine testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so Saint Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawfull, and profitable, to remember whatsoeuer hee found agreeable to the Word of God, among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not: as in his Epistle to Titus, he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander, and in the seuenteenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoeuer vttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunq; dicatur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learne this rule; Quæ sacris seruiunt, prophana non subit; Nothing is prophane that serueth to the vse of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. 1. 1.

THis visible World of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning; or, first of all: in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrewes seeke some hidden mysterie, and which in the Iewes Targum is conuerted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men haue conceiued, both which are subsequent: but onely to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater Power, then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we faine a double Creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite, the impossibilitie whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot bee more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other. Cusan. de Mente lib. 3.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth: Genesis 2. 1.

THe vniuersall matter of the world (which Moyses comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers diuersly vnderstood: for there are that conceiue, that by those words, was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderstand it, to which, S. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Feciſti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi, quam feciſti de nulla re, penè nullam rem: (that is) Thou hast made the world of a matter without forme; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginarie materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoole-men, Beda, Lyranus, Comestor, Tostatus and others, affirme, that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heauen: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heauen Steuchius Eugubinus calleth Diuine claritie, and vncreated: an errour, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceiue) he rather fayled in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seate of Angels, and iust Soules, then in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liueth in eternall Light, it is written; My soule, praise thou the Lord, that couereth himselfe with light: and in the Reuelation; And the Citie hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also Iohn Mercer vpon Genesis, differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuisible or superceleſtiall; so in his iudgement, because it was in all Eternitie, the glorious seate of God himselfe, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum supercœlestem meo iudicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

Beda Hex. Strabo super Genes. Eug. Cos. & de nat. incorp.

Psal. 104. 12. Claritas diuina nõ est lux facta, sed sapientia Dei, non creata, sed nata. Apoc. 21. 23. Mercer. in Gen. cap. 1. vers. 1.

But as Moses forbare to speake of Angels, and of things inuisible, and incorporate, for the weakneſſe of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of thoſe things, which were more manifeſt, (to wit) that God did not only by a ſtrong hand deliuer them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promiſe made to their forefathers: but alſo that he created, and was the ſole cauſe of this aſpectable, and perceiueable Vniuerſall; ſo on the other ſide I dare not thinke, that any ſuperceleſtiall Heauen, or whatſoeuer elſe (not himſelfe) was increate & eternall: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wiſdome of mortall men hath no pereeption of it, neither can it limit the ſeate of infinite power, no more then infinite power it ſelfe can be limited: for his place is in himſelfe, whom no magnitude elſe can cõtain: How great is the houſe of God (ſaith BARVCH) how large is the place of his poſſeßions! it is great, and hath no end, it is high and vnmeaſurable.

Bar. 3. 24. 25.

But leauing multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable & allowed, that by the words Heauen and Earth, was meant the ſolid matter and ſubſtance, aſwell of all the Heauens, and Orbes ſupernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which couered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, poßibilitas, ſiue poſſe fieri. Which matter (ſaith Caluin) was ſo called, quòd totius mundi ſemen fuerit; Becauſe it was the ſeed of the Vniuerſall: an opinion of ancient Philoſophers long before.

§. V.

That the ſubſtance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by MOSES vnderſtood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of vnformed and voide, is deſcribed as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

MOSES firſt nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards hee nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to diſtinguiſh the confuſed Maſſe, and (as Baſil ſaith) præparare naturam aquæ ad fœcunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulneſſe.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heauenly bodies, and natures expreſt: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatſoeuer is vnder the Moone, and ſubiect to alteration. Corrupt ſeedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heauens are not ſubiect, though ſubiect to periſhing. They ſhall periſh (ſaith Dauid) and the heauens ſhall vaniſh away like ſmoke, ſaith Eſay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters vnder the heauens be gathered into one place, and let the drie land appeare: which proueth that the drie land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet diſtinguiſhed; but no way, that the waters were the matter or ſeede of the Earth, much leſſe of the Vniuerſall. Initio tu Domine terram fundaſti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning haſt founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, ſaith Dauid. And if by naturall arguments it may be proued, that water by condenſation may become earth, the ſame reaſon teacheth vs alſo, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire: aire, fire; and ſo on the contrarie. Deus ignis ſubſtantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the ſubſtance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the ſame ſtate, in which they were created, as touching their ſubſtance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in reſpect of beautie and ornament. Cælum verò & terra in ſtatu creationis remanſerunt, quantum ad ſubſtantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis poſtmodùm ſuperaddita eſt. And the word which the Hebrewes cal Maim, is not to be vnderſtood according to the Latine tranſlation ſimply, and as ſpecificall water; but the ſame more properly ſignifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Eſt autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Maim (ſaith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name or word the Latines wanting a voice to expreſſe it, call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters.

This Maſſe, or indigeſted matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had ſeparated the Earth, and digeſted it from the waters: And the earth was voide: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and wrought this indigeſted matter into that forme, which it now retayneth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which ſeedeth ſeede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kind, and God ſaw that it was good; which attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confuſed; nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adornement. God ſaw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta ſunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their inuention of Demogorgon: Heſiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Ouid:

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heauen, that all doth hide,
In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heape.

§. VI.

How it is to bee vnderſtood that the Spirit of God mooued vpon the Waters, and that this is not to bee ſearched curiouſly.

AFter the Creation of Heauen and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters. The Seuenty Interpreters vſe the word ſuperferebatur, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fouebat (ſaith Hierome) out of Baſil; and Baſil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, ſed viri cuiuſdam Syri ſententiam recenſebo (ſaith Baſil:) which words incubare or fouere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a ſpeciall likeneſſe. Verbum tranſlatum eſt ab auibus pullitiei ſuæ incubantibus, quamuis ſpirituali, & planè inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their yong, not corporally, but in a ſpirituall and vnexpreſſible manner. Baſil. Hexam. Iunius.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldæan Paraphraſt in this ſenſe, Ventus à conſpectu Dei ſufflabat: or as other vnderſtand the Chaldæan, Flabat, pellebat, remouebat: The wind from the face of God did blow vnder, driue, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Pſalme, He cauſed his wind to blow, and the waters increaſe: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in theſe words, Et Spiritus Elohim Meracheſet, id eſt, efficaciter motitans, confouens, ac agitans ſuper facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moouing, keeping warme, and cheriſhing, quickning and ſtirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the laſt paſſiue and materiall, to wit, Cauſa, which is the diuine goodneſſe: Iehi, which is, fiat, ſiue erit, Let it be, or it ſhall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (ſaith he) was the firſt that was vttered by the word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id eſt, vis quædam diuina, agilis ac præſens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens, that is, A certayne diuine power, or ſtrength euery where, actiue and extending, and ſtretching through all, filling and finiſhing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id eſt, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become euery thing. For my ſelfe I am reſolued (Cùm Deus ſit ſuperrationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reaſon aboue reaſon) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull wayes of working, may in a meaſure be perceiued by mans vnderſtanding, yet the manner & firſt operation of his diuine power, cannot be conceiued by any mind, or ſpirit, compaſſed with a mortall body. Animalis homo quæ Dei ſunt non percipit: For my thoughts (ſaith the Lord in ESAY) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himſelfe: ſo are his wayes (according to S. PAVL) paſt finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, ſaith Chriſt. And therefore, whether that motion, vitalitie and operation, were by incubation or how elſe, the manner is onely knowne to God, Quomodo in omnibus ſit rebus vel per eſſentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noſter non capit; For, how God (ſaith S. Auguſtine, ſpeaking of his Vbiquitie) is in all things, either by eſſence, preſence, or power, our vnderſtanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemq; diſtaret, ſi conſilia, & diſpoſitiones illius maieſtatis æternæ, cogitatio aſſequeretur humana: There would be no difference betweene God and Man, if mans vnderſtanding could conceiue the counſels and diſpoſing of that eternall Maieſtie; and therefore to bee ouer-curious in ſearching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operatiue Spirit diſtinguiſhing, gaue forme to the Matter of the Vniuerſall, is a labour and ſearch like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and ſafe Foord, will preſume to paſſe ouer the greateſt Riuer in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for ſo doth the one loſe his life, and the other his vnderſtanding. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumſpectly: we warme our ſelues ſafely, while we ſtand neare the fire; but if we ſeeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eſchew curioſitie: this is true, that the Engliſh word (moued) is moſt proper and ſignificant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatſoeuer is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truely called, Principium motus, and with MIRANDVLA, Vis cauſæ efficientis; The force of the efficient cauſe, S. Auguſtine ſometimes taketh for the holy Ghoſt; ſometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, vnder the name of a Spirit, which is ſometimes ſo taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it alſo a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: ANAXAGORAS, Mentem: TOSTATVS, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh Animam mundi, The ſoule of the world: and in his ſixt Booke de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heauen; in his Epiſtles, The Leader of things to come, and the preſence of things paſt. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Chriſt our Sauiour, Mens deficit, vox ſilet, & non mea tantùm, ſed etiam Angelorum; My minde fayleth, my voice is ſilent, and not mine onely, but euen the voice of Angels: ſo may all men elſe ſay in the vnderſtanding, and vtterance of the wayes and works of the Creation; for to him (ſaith Nazianzenus) there is not one ſubſtance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed conſubſtantiale illi eſt, quicquid eius eſt, & quicquid eſt; Whatſoeuer attribute of him there is, and whatſoeuer he is, it is the very ſame ſubſtance that himſelfe is.

Nazian. lib. 2. Theol.

But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, ſeparate from the infinite actiue power of God, which then formed and diſtinguiſhed, and which now ſuſtayneth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuerſall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the ſame is it which maintayneth all things, ſaith SALOMON. If thou ſend forth thy Spirit (ſaith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus ſuo præſentiali eſſe, dat omnibus rebus eſſe, ita quòd, ſi ſe rebus ſubtraheret, ſicut de nihilo facta ſunt omnia, ſic in nihilum defluerent vniuerſa; God giueth being to all things, by being preſent with all things, ſo as if he ſhould withdraw himſelfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vaniſh into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expreſt excellently:

Wiſd. cap. 1. v. 7.

Virg. Æneid. lib. 8. 724.

Principio Cœlum ac Terras, campoſq́; liquentes, Lucentemq́; globum Lunæ, Titaniaq́; aſtra,

Mens agitat molem, & magno ſe corpore miſcet.

The Heauen, the Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,
The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,
A Spirit within maintaynes: and their whole maſſe,
A Mind, which through each part infus'd doth paſſe, Faſhions, and works, and wholly doth tranſpierce
All this great Body of the Vniuerſe.

And this was the ſame Spirit, which moued in the Vniuerſall, and thereby both diſtinguiſhed and adorned it. His Spirit hath garniſhed the Heauens, ſaith Iob. So then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in them their ſpiritualitie, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarifaction, and ſubtilitie of parts. By this Spirit (which gaue heate and motion, and thereby, operation to euery nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigeſted lump, and Chaos, diſpoſed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element ſuperior, as lighter then the waters, through whoſe vaſt, open, ſubtile, diaphanicke, or tranſparent body, the light afterwards created might eaſily tranſpierce: Light, for the excellency thereof, being the firſt creature which God called good, whoſe creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chryſoſtome calleth a vitall Operation, Aquis à Deo inſitam, ex qua aquæ non ſolùm motionem, ſed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vitall Operation giuen by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but alſo power to procreate or bring forth liuing Creatures.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

THese waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vnited, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the vniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proued by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of Heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the fift Verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, & other lights of heauen: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that Light it selfe, Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it selfe & all things else visible) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Æther, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium cœlestium virtutum, & impressionum: The conducter, and preseruer or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heauenly influences, but by the medium, or meanes of light. Aristotle calleth light, a qualitie, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better auouched of the heate, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (say the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine residet in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be depriued of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academikes make incorporall, and so doth MONTANVS, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaueth.

Lux dicitur, quæ se, & omnia visibilia facit. Cusan. in Compend. cap. 7. & exercit. lib. 5.

Aristotle findeth corporalitie in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, giue materialitie to light it selfe, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the Heauen to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other Cristalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by vncleane, and vnpure earthy substances, lesse hard, and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quòd obstaculum naturâ terreum atq; sordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle, by nature earthy and foule, doth not receiue the pure clearnesse of light: alluding to that most diuine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly drosse, and humane vncleannesse.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselues therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hereof, but there is no man that hath beene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his owne iudgement herein, as weake as any mans; and most of the Schoolemen were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtile in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discouerers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophie or Diuinitie: of whom it may be truely said, Nihil sapientiæ odiosius acumine nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wisedome, then too acute sharpnesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought brought forth and deuoured) reſolued vs, whether this light be ſubſtantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they ſay it cannot bee, becauſe then it could neither pierce the aire, nor thoſe hard, ſolid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet euery day we ſee the aire illightned: incorporall it cannot bee, becauſe it ſometime affecteth the ſight of the eye with offence, and therefore by moſt of the Fathers ſo eſteemed: others ſay, (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, becauſe no forme ſo excellent as it ſelfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not ſeparable without the deſtruction of the ſubiect: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in exiſtence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both muſt be one of theſe, lucide or bright, darke or opake, Diaphanous or tranſparent; but darkneſſe cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darkneſſe, but capable of either) cannot be the cauſe of either, and therefore muſt the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and ſhining. Lucide and ſhining obtayne their ſo being of the light; and therefore, if wee deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progreſſe goe on infinitely, and againſt nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it ſelfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and ſhining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

Lucida corpora ſunt plena ſua luce, alieuis tenebris impernia. Opaca ſunt plena ſuis tenebris alieno lumine. Tranſparentia ſeu Diaphana carent ſuis & lumine & tenebris: alienis & lumine & tenebris permeantur. Scal. ſubt. ex. 71.

But in my vnderſtanding, Lumen, (which may be Engliſhed by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may be Engliſhed by Light, and ſo, this ſhining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heauen, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentionall Species thereof; and an intentionall Species may be vnderſtood by the example of a red, or greene colour, occaſioned by the ſhining of the Sun through red or greene glaſſe: for then we perceiue the ſame colour caſt vpon any thing oppoſite; which redneſſe or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glaſſe. And againe, as this light, touching his ſimple nature, is no way yet vnderſtood: ſo it is diſputed, whether this light firſt created, bee the ſame which the Sunne inholdeth and caſteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer then till the Sunnes creation.

But by the moſt wiſe and vnchanged order, which God obſerued in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the firſt day created, was the ſubſtance of the Sunne: for Moſes repeateth twice the mayne parts of the Vniuerſall; firſt, as they were created in matter; ſecondly, as they were adorned with forme: firſt, naming the Heauens, the Earth, the Waters, all confuſed; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heauens diſtinguiſhed from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncouered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or inriched with their vertuall formes: ſo the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beautie, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the ſubſtance thereof in the firſt day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly diſperſed, was in the ſame fourth day vnited, and ſet in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the firſt day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was, to ſeparate day from night) were preciſely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtayned life and motion. Neither did the wiſedome of God finde cauſe why it ſhould mooue (by which motion, dayes and nights are diſtinguiſhed) till then: becauſe there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heate, and operation.

But after the Earth (diſtinguiſhed from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God cauſed the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to viſite euery part of the inferiour world; by his heate to ſtirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue actiuitie to the ſeeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth ſome goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the ſame to that vſe and end, to which it was ordayned; ſo it pleaſed God (ſaith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull Word he approued, and approuing it, diſpoſed thereof, to the vſe and comfort of his future Creatures.

Iob 38. 24. 9.

But in that it pleaſed God to aske of IOB, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderſtanding; and therefore let it ſuffice, that by Gods grace we enioy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treaſure of God (ſaith ESDRAS.) And thoſe which inhabite the Heauens, doe onely know the Eſſence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cœlo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing vnknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res verâ ſunt in mundo inuiſibili, in mundo viſibili vmbræ rerum: Things themſelues are in the inuiſible world, in the world viſible, but their ſhadowes: Surely, if this Light be not ſpirituall, yet it approcheth neareſt vnto ſpiritualitie; and if it haue any corporalitie, then of all other the moſt ſubtile and pure; for howſoeuer, it is of all things ſeene, the moſt beautifull, and of the ſwifteſt motion, of all other the moſt neceſſary and beneficiall. For it miniſtreth to men, and other creatures, all celeſtiall influences; it diſſipateth thoſe ſad thoughts and ſorrowes, which the darkneſſe both begetteth and maintayneth; it diſcouereth vnto vs the glorious works of God, and carryeth vp with an Angelicall ſwiftneſſe, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the ſight thereof, our minds being informed of his viſible maruailes, may continually trauaile to ſurmount theſe perceiued Heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cauſe and Creator. Cognitio non quieſcit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it ſelfe in things created. Et ipſa lux facit, vt cætera mundi membra digna ſint laudibus, cùm ſuam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (ſaith Saint AMBROSE) that maketh the other parts of the world ſo worthy of praiſe, ſeeing that it ſelfe communicateth its goodneſſe and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

Ille ego ſum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus,
Mundi oculus.

The World diſcernes it ſelfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longeſt yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Laſtly, if we may behold in any creature, any one ſparke of that eternall fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightneſſe, the ſame in the beautie, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be perceiued. Therefore was God called Lux ipſa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux ſancta, and Chriſt our Sauiour ſaid to be that Light, which lighteth euery man that commeth into the world. Yet in reſpect of Gods incomprehenſible ſublimitie, and puritie, this is alſo true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other ſpirits; nor a light, ſuch as can be diſcerned. Deus profectò non mens eſt, at verò vt ſit mens cauſa eſt; nec ſpiritus, ſed cauſa qua ſpiritus extat; nec lumen, ſed cauſa qua lumen exiſtit. God (ſaith HERMES in Pœmandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cauſe that the minde hath his being; nor ſpirit, but the cauſe by which euery ſpirit is; nor light, but the cauſe by which the light exiſteth.

So then the Maſſe and Chaos being firſt created, void, darke, and imformed, was by the operatiue Spirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit and motion, reſolued their thinner parts into Aire, which God illightned: the Earth alſo by being contiguat, and mixt with waters (participating the ſame diuine vertue) brought forth the bud of the herbe that ſeedeth ſeede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operatiue vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be vnited, and gaue it alſo motion and heate, which heate cauſed a continuance of thoſe ſeuerall ſpecies, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times ſucceeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there be any Criſtalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

AFter that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God ſaid, Let there be a Firmament in the middeſt of the waters, and let it ſeparate the waters from the waters: that is, thoſe waters which by rarifaction and euaporation were aſcended, and thoſe of the Earth and Sea.

But theſe waters ſeparate aboue this extenſion, which the Latine Tranſlation calleth firmamentum, or expanſum (for ſo Vatablus, Pagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the Criſtalline Heauens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Baſilius Magnus calleth a childiſh ſuppoſition, making in the ſame place many learned arguments againſt againſt this fancy. For the waters aboue the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire aboue vs, where the ſame is more ſolid and condenſe, which God ſeparated from the neather waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended diſtance and vaſt ſpace: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamaïm, being indifferently taken for the Heauen and for Aire, and more properly for the Aire and Æther, then for the Heauens, as the beſt Hebricians vnderſtand them, Quo ſuprema ac tenuia ab infimis craſsis diducta, interſectaq. diſtarent, for that whereby the ſupreme and thin bodies were placed in diſtance, being ſeuered and cut off from low and groſſe matters: and the waters aboue the Firmament, expreſt in the word Maïm, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters aboue the Aire, or in the vppermoſt Region of the ſame.

Mont. Nat. hiſt. fol. 152.

And that the word Heauen is vſed for the Aire, the Scriptures euerywhere witneſſe, as in the bleſſings of Ioſeph, and in the 104. Pſalme. * By theſe Springs ſhall the fowle of the Heauen dwell; and a vpon Sodom and Gomorrha it rayned brimſtone and fire out of the Heauen; and in Iſaacs bleſſing to Iacob, GOD giue thee therefore of the dew of Heauen; and in Deuteronomie the 11. But the land whither you goe to poſſeſſe it, is a land, that drinketh water of the rayne of Heauen; and in IOB, Who hath ingendred the froſts of Heauen; and in S. MATTHEW, Behold the Fowles of Heauen, for they ſow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the old Teſtament throughout, is the word Heauen very often vſed for aire, and taken alſo hyperbolically for any great heigth, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whoſe top may reach to Heauen, &c. And in this very place Baſil auoucheth, that this appellation of Heauen for the Firmament, is but by way of ſimilitude: his owne words be theſe; Et vocauit Deus firmamentum cœlum. Hæc appellatio alij quidem propriè accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad ſimilitudinem; And God called the firmament Heauen: This appellation (ſaith Baſil) is properly applyed to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is impoſed by ſimilitude: and if there were no other proofe, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heauen, the words of MOSES in the eighth Verſe, conferred with the ſame word Firmament in the twentieth Verſe, makes it manifeſt: for in the eighth Verſe it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verſe he calleth the Firmament of Heauen, Ayre, in theſe words: And let the Fowle flye vpon the earth in the open firmament of Heauen. And what vſe there ſhould be of this ycie, or criſtalline, or waterie Heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the Primum nobile would otherwiſe gather and increaſe: though in verie truth, in ſtead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeaſurable greatneſſe of circle, whereby the ſwiftneſſe of that firſt Moueable would exceede all poſſibilitie of beliefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impoſsibilia; but no man ought to be held to impoſsibilities; and faith it ſelfe (which ſurmounteth the heighth of all humane reaſon) hath for a forcible Conducter, the Word of Truth, which alſo may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reaſon and vnderſtanding. Now that this ſuppoſed firſt Moueable, turneth it ſelfe ſo many hundred thouſand miles in an inſtant (ſeeing the Scriptures teach it not) let thoſe that can beleeue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of theſe many Heauens, let the Reader that deſireth ſatisfaction, ſearch Orontius, and of this waterie Heauen, Baſilius Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his ſecond Booke, and ſixt Chapter. For my ſelfe, I am perſwaded, that the waters, called, The waters aboue the Heauens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendred in the vppermoſt Ayre.

A concluſion repeating the ſumme of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finiſhing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the firſt Chapter of Geneſis, that this was the order of the moſt wiſe GOD in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehenſible eternitie. Firſt, hee created the matter of all things: and in the firſt three dayes he diſtinguiſhed and gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which aſcended, to that which deſcended, the forme of grauitie: for he ſeparated light from darkeneſſe, diuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. In the laſt three three daies, God adorned, beautified, and replenithed the World: he ſet in the Firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beaſts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fiſh, giuing to all that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their ſeedes in themſelues; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preſerued. Wiſd. Sal. 1. 14.

§. X.

That Nature is no Principium per ſe; nor forme the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how ſecond cauſes ſhould haue any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and reſt, according to Ariſtotle, the ſame is nothing elſe, but the ſtrength and facultie, which God hath infuſed into euerie creature, hauing no other ſelfe-abilitie, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. Theſe therefore that atttribute vnto this facultie, any firſt or ſole power, haue therein no other vnderſtanding, then ſuch a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth aſcribe ſome abſolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all conſideration of the hand that guides it, or of the iudgement, which alſo directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all elſe, that by the vertue of the firſt act, all Agents worke whatſoeuer they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man ſeeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute ſight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde onely, that giueth abilitie, life, and motion to all theſe his inſtruments and Organs; ſo God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infuſed properties, and by men, as by ſeuerall Organs, ſeuerall effects; all ſecond cauſes whatſoeuer, being but inſtruments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and diſperſe what they haue receyued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuerſall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euerie-where-preſence (compaſſing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: ſo all ſecond and inſtrumentall cauſes, together with Nature it ſelfe, without that operatiue facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether ſilent, vertueleſſe, and dead: of which excellentlie ORPHEVS; Per te vireſcunt omnia, All things by thee ſpring forth in youthfull greene. I enforce not theſe things, thereby to annihilate thoſe variable vertues which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heauenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayſe him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philoſophers, and thoſe that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I ſay, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expreſſe it, euer enrich his owne vnderſtanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not fooliſh by ſelfe-flatterie) therein. For (ſaith Lactantius, ſpeaking of the wiſedome of the Philoſophers) Si facultas inueniendæ veritatis huic ſtudio ſubiaceret, aliquandò eſſet inuenta; cùm verò tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in eius inquiſitione contritis, non ſit comprehenſa, apparet nullam ibi eſſe ſapientiam; If in this ſtudie (ſaith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this beene found out: but ſeeing it is not yet comprehended, after that ſo much time, and ſo many wits haue beene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wiſedome there to be had. Nam ſi de vnare præciſa ſcientia haberetur, omnium rerum ſcientia neceſſariò haberetur: If the preciſe knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it ſhould neceſſarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philoſophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: ſo were they more curious, then knowing, in their firſt matter and Phyſicall forme. For if their firſt matter had any being, it were not then the firſt matter: for, as it is the firſt matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth ſubſiſt. And ſeeing it is neither a ſubſtance perfect, nor a ſubſtance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other ſubſtance ſhould thence take concreſcence, it hath not beene taught, neyther are theſe formes (ſaith a learned Author) any thing, ſi ex ea exprimatur potentia, quæ nihil eſt. Againe, how this firſt matter ſhould be ſubiectum iectum formarum, and passiue, which is vnderstood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceiue: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrarie to all reason, diuine and humane: onely it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betweene matter and forme, then betweene heate and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of rationall consideration. Leauing therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and peruert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to proue a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to affirme with Saint AVGVSTINE, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, whatsoeuer is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seedes of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscunq; generis est, cuiuscunq; æstimationis est, à quo sunt semina formarum, formæ seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an ineuitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is, by giuing it Dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Iuuenal:

Basil. Esa. 4. Aug. de hæres. 70. c. 35. Tho. cont. Gent. 3. cap. 83. 3. cap. 83. Ficin. in 12. de leg. Cic. de fat.

An errour of the Chaldæans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiall Orbes, vnchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rationall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and ineuitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vnoquoq; nostrûm fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainely it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunne-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and colde, are not so vncertained by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to colde earth, to plants and stones, Mineralls, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should we robbe the beautifull Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beautie and magnitude, wee may not thinke, that in the treasurie of his wisedome, who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euerie Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beutifie the earth alone, and to couer & shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the vse of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorne it, but for instruments and Organs of his diuine prouidence, so farre as it hath pleased his iust will

to determine. Origen vpon this place of Geneſis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Starres are not cauſes (meaning perchance binding cauſes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and ſet downe all things whatſoeuer to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wiſedome: which latter part I beleeue well, and this ſaying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things then theſe be, and we haue ſeene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacitie of men, wee know ſomewhat, yet in the true and vttermoſt vertues of herbes and plants, which our ſelues ſow and ſet, and which grow vnder our feet, wee are in effect ignorant, much more in the powers and working of celeſtiall bodies. for hardly (ſaith SALOMON) can we diſcerne the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out thoſe things that are before vs: who can then inueſtigate the things that are in Heauen? Multum eſt de rebus cœleſtibus aliquid cognoſcere: It is much to know a little of heauenly things. But in this queſtion of Fate, the middle courſe is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this ſuppoſed neceſſitie of deſtinie, ſo on the contrarie, wee doe not robbe thoſe beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For be any of theſe ſecond cauſes deſpoyled God of his prerogatiue, or had God himſelfe conſtrayned the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celeſtiall inforcements, then ſure the impious excuſe of ſome were iuſtifiable; of whom Saint AVGVSTINE: Impiè peruerſitate in malis factis rectiſſimè reprehendendis ingerunt accuſandum potius auctorē ſyderum, quàm commiſſarem ſcelerum. Where we reprehend them of euill deeds, they againe, with wicked peruerſeneſſe vrge, that rather the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accuſed.

Gen.1.15. Eccl.42.c.32. Wisd.9.16. Ariſtotle. Aug.2.ſuper Gen.ad lit.

But that the Starres and other celeſtiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the ſenſitiue appetite, which is alſo ſtirred by the conſtitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora cœleſtia (ſaith DAMASCENE) conſtituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & diſpoſitiones, The heauenly bodies (ſaith hee) make in vs habits, complexions, and diſpoſitions: for the bodie (though Galen inforce it further) hath vndoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, eſpecially bodies ſtrong in humour, and weake in vertues; for thoſe of cholericke complexion are ſubiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they ſuffer themſelues to bee tranſported; where the minde hath not reaſon to remember, that paſſions ought to be her Vaſſals, not her Maſters. And that they wholly direct the reaſonleſſe mind I am reſolued; For of all thoſe which were created mortall, as birds, beaſts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celeſtiall bodies (as inſtruments and Executioners of Gods prouidence) haue abſolute dominion. What we ſhould iudge of men, who little differ from beaſts, I cannot tell: for as hee that contendeth againſt thoſe inforcements, may eaſily maſter or reſiſt them: ſo whoſoeuer ſhall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himſelfe altogether vnder the power of his ſenſuall appetite; Vincitur fatum ſi reſiſtas, vincit ſi contempſerù: Fate will be ouercome, if thou reſiſt it, if thou neglect, it conquereth.

Gal.1.mor.an. ſeq.temp. Quint.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is abſurd to thinke, other then as aforeſaid, as the ſame by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen ſolis ad generationem ſenſibilium corporum conſunt, & ad vitam ipſam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (ſaith Saint AVGVSTINE) helpeth the generation of ſenſible bodies, moueth them to life, and nouriſheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet ſtill as a Miniſter, not as a Maſter: Bonus quidem eſt Sol, in miniſterio, non imperio; The Sunne is good to ſerue, not to ſway (ſaith S. Ambroſe) And Saint AVGVSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per ſuperiora; God ruleth the bodies below by thoſe aboue, but hee auoucheth not, that ſuperiour bodies haue rule ouer mens mindes, which are incorporeall.

Aug.de Ciuit. Dei,lib.5. Hex.lib.4.de terra.3.

But howſoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the ſame, and weaken their operation: and Ariſtotle himſelfe confeſſeth, that the Heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferiour bodies, no more then the ſignes of raine and winde doe alwaies come to paſſe. And it is diuers times ſeene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to theſe inclinations. Eſt in ingenijs patrum virtus; In the young off-ſpring the Fathers vertue is, and ſo the contrarie, patrum vitia: and herein alſo there is often found an enterchange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill conſtellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Hor.lib.4.Od.4.

Egregia eſt ſoboles, ſcelerato nata parente.

A worthie ſonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reſerued power) that ſo much ſetteth this art of influence out of ſquare and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World ſo wickedly inclined, but that a religious inſtruction and bringing vp may faſhion anew and reforme them; nor any ſo well diſpoſed, whom (the reines being let looſe) the continuall fellowſhip and familiaritie, and the examples of diſſolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Veſſels will euer retaine a ſauour of their firſt liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cleanſe the minde once corrupted, or to extinguiſh the ſweet ſauour of vertue firſt receyued, when the minde was yet tender, open, and eaſily ſeaſoned; but where a fauourable conſtellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found ſo exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heauen and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the ſeedes of vertue may by the art and huſbandrie of Chriſtian counſaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the ſtrength of ſelfe-nature and kind could haue yeelded them; ſo the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themſelues into weedes, by beeing ſet in a ſoyle ſutable, and like themſelues, are made more vnſauourie and filled with poyſon. It was therefore truely affirmed, Sapiens adiuuabit opus aſtrorum, quemadmodum agricola terræ naturam; A wiſe man aſſiſteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the ſoyle. And Ptolomie himſelfe confeſſeth thus much, Sapiens, & omina ſapientis medici dominabuntur aſtris, A wiſeman, and the ominous art of a wiſe Phyſician ſhall preuaile againſt the Starres. Laſtly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the reſt of the Vniuerſal, whoſe influences may be called his reſerued and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs conſider how they bind: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer ſhall ſuffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magiſtrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet theſe Lawes doe not depriue Kings of their naturall or religious compaſſion, or binde them without prerogatiue, to ſuch a ſeuere execution, as that there ſhould be nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or conſcience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But ſeeing that it is otherwiſe, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe ſometimes for cauſes to themſelues knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both againſt others and themſelues, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himſelfe, which his Subſtitutes enioy; God being mercie, goodneſſe, and charitie it ſelfe. Otherwiſe that example of Prayer by our Sauiour taught; And let vs not be led into temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had beene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truely) hath aſſured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation ſo forcible, which our humble Prayers and deſires may not make fruſtrate, and breake aſunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Deſtinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and diſpoſed, had ſuch a connexion and immutable dependencie, that God himſelfe ſhould in a kind haue ſhut vp himſelfe therein: How miſerable then were the condition of men (ſaith S. AVGVSTINE) left altogether without hope!

Mat. 6. 13.

And if this ſtrength of the Starres were ſo transferred, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be hee Pagan or Chriſtian that ſo beleeueth, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginarie gods of the other would thereby be deſpoyled of all worſhip, reuerence, or reſpect.

And certainly, God which hath promiſed vs the reward of well-doing, which Chriſt himſelfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I haue finiſhed the worke which thou gaueſt mee to doe:) and the ſame God, who hath threatned vnto vs the ſorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be ſo vniuſt, as to bind vs ineuitably to the Deſtinies or influences of the Starres, or ſubiect our ſoules to any impoſed neceſſitie. But it was well ſaid of Plotinus, that the Starres were ſignificant, but not efficient, giuing them yet ſomething leſſe then their due: and therefore as I do not conſent with them, who would make thoſe glorious creatures of God vertueleſſe: ſo I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and abſolute power and prouidence, to aſcribe to them them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receiue influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie, and that of the Starres is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est vmbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Prouidence, Prescience, and Predestination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for euery man hath not obserued it, though all learned men haue. Plat. pol. 6. Ficin. in l. 7. pol.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

PRescience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Prouidence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prescience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoeuer our selues fore-know, except the same be to succeede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prescience of God (as it is Prescience onely) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neyther doth Gods foreknowlege impose any necessitie, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the World shall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Haruest, and that according to the seuerall seedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neyther doth the knowledge in vs binde or constraine the Sunne to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men perswade themselues) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith BOETIVS) beholdeth those things subiect to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their owne nature. And againe out of the same Authour; Diuina prouidentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia euenirent ex necessitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorũ periret; Diuine Prouidence (saith he) imposeth no necessity vpon things that are to exist, for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of euil. Boetius de consol.

§. XIII.

Of Prouidence.

NOw Prouidence (which the Greekes call Pronoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Prouidence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is diuided into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and wee our selues account such a man for prouident, as, remembring things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, prouide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Prouidence, the Scriptures euery-where teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure vs hereof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Prouidence of God: yea the Turkes themselues are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any perill whatsoeuer, though death therein doe manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture prooving prouidence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall need to repeate but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (saith DAVID) which couereth the Heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow vpon the Mountaines, which giueth to beasts their food, and feedeth the yong Rauen that cries: All these wait vpon thee, that thou mayest giue them food in due season. And thou shalt drinke of the Riuer Chereth (saith God to ELIAH) and I haue com- Psal. 147. 8. 9. Psal. 104. 27. 145. 15.

1.Reg.17.4. Math.6.26. Luke 12.6.7. 1.Pet 5.7. Pſal.36.6. commanded the Rauens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they ſow not, nor reape, and yet your heauenly Father feedeth them: Againe, Are not two Sparrowes ſold for a farthing? and one of them ſhall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haires of your head are numbred: And S. PETER, Caſt all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his iudgements are written, ſaith DAVID.

Ier.23.24. God therefore, who is euerie-where preſent, who filleth the Heauens and the Earth, whoſe eyes are vpon the righteous, and his countenance againſt them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be eſteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not Eſai. 42.8. giue my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings preſence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euery-where preſent, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuerſall Prouidence is ſeene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beaſts and birds and all liuings for their young ones. If prouidence bee found in ſecond Fathers, much more in the firſt and Vniuerſall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beaſts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whoſe Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuerſall: Amor diuinus rerum omnium eſt principium, & vinculum vniuerſi (ſaith PLATO.) Amor Dei eſt nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; eius immobile ſuſtentaculum, ac vniuerſæ machinæ fundamentum; The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chayne of the world, and the immoueable pillar of euery part thereof, and the Baſis and foundation of the vniuerſall. God therefore who could only be the cauſe of all, can only prouide for all, and ſuſtaine all; ſo as to abſolute power; to euery-where preſence; to perfect goodneſſe; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute tranſcendent hability of Prouidence is only proper and belonging.

Ioh.ep.1.c.4. ver.8. God is loue.

§. XIV.

Of Predeſtination.

NOw for Predeſtination; we can difference it no otherwiſe, from Prouidence and Preſcience, then in this, that Preſcience onely fore-ſeeth: Prouidence fore-ſeeth & careth for, and hath reſpect to all creatures, euen from the brightſt Angels of Heauen, to the vnworthieſt Wormes of the Earth, and Predeſtination (as it is vſed ſpecially by Diuines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their ſaluation properly, in the common vſe of Diuines, or perdition, as ſome haue vſed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernenſis Theologus, and others, take the word Predeſtination more ſtrictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely ſometimes: among whom S. Auguſtine ſpeaking of two Cities, and two Societies, vſeth theſe words, Quarum eſt vna, qua prædeſtinata eſt in æternũ regnare cum Deo, altera æternum ſupplicium ſubire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predeſtinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is to vndergoe euerlaſting torment with the Deuill: for according to NONIVS MARCELLVS, deſtinare eſt præparare; and of the ſame opinion are many Proteſtant writers, as Caluin, Beza, Buchanus, Daneus, and ſuch like: and as for the manifold queſtions hereof ariſing, I leaue them to the Diuines; and why it hath pleaſed God to create ſome veſſels of honour, and ſome of diſhonour, I will anſwer with Gregorie, who ſaith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem ſuam conſiderans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that ſeeth no reaſon in the actions of God, by conſideration of his owne infirmity perceyueth the reaſon of his blindneſſe. And againe with S. AVGVSTINE, Occulta eſſe cauſa poteſt, iniuſta eſſe non poteſt; Hidden the cauſe of his Predeſtination may be, vniuſt it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reaſon of ſome things that ſeeme to be by fortune, and againſt Reaſon and Prouidence.

LAſtly, ſeeing Deſtinie or Neceſſitie is ſubſequent to Gods prouidence, and ſeeing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before ſpoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificioſum Dei Organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CVSANVS, Diuini præcepti inſtrumentum;

The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CVSANVS, Diuini præcepti instrumentum; The instrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddesse, the most reuerenced, and the most reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messeniacks. The Greekes call her τύχη, signifying a relatiue being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Ladie was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfait gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward she grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggers and Cottages, she ordered all things, resisting the wisdome of the wisest, by making the Possessor therof miserable; valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous, insomuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her pastimes: of which * PALLADIVS, Vita hominum ludus fortunæ est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels haue equal successe to those by the best iudgement conducted, therfore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience: wherof Athenæus:

Sen. Ep. 91. Aur. Vict. de pertinace Sen. ep. 74 Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great and often changes of his Fortune, is said to haue vsed to crye out vpon Fortune, applying to her a Verse of Æschylus, Tu me extulisti, eadem me is (lentio) perditum.

Longissimè à Sapientia Fors dissidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen similima:

From Wisedome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbeare to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and endeuours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be giuen, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoeuer may be obiected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris, (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Poetæ fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God; and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the Law of Murder. He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby another is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Prouerbs, the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casuall and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soule of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdome, which we expresse by the name of God, gouerning euery being aswell in heauen as in earth; to which wisdome and power they sometime gaue the title of Necessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by inexitable ordinance; sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis, the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoeuer (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by diuers termes, according as he vseth, and exerciseth his power diuersly.

Terentius Fortuna Deum, cæcam, locamus. Sat. 10. 366. Exod. 21. 12. 13. Vers. 5. Vers. 33. Cic. ac. quæst. l. 1 Sen. l. 4. c. 7.

But it may be obiected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe; how comes it then, that so many worthie and wise men depend vpon so many vnworthy and empte-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without kernell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and deiected estates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partialitie of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue: for whosoeuer is most able, and best sufficient to discerne, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth; if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourse then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euermore hang vnder the wheele; which kinde of deseruing well and receiuing ill, we alwaies falsly charge Fortune withall. For whosoeuer shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not iust; the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire; shall neuer be made a Counseller, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wise Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperitie; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrarie qualities; saile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an obseruant slauish course? These men hauing nothing else to value themselues by, but a counterfait kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them beleeue that all their vices are vertues, and all their dustie actions crystalline, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogantia & plausibus capitur; Euerie foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause: so as whosoeuer will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obserue them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrarie, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the authour of his owne miserie; but best it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Heresie raged:

Ouid. sem. am. lib. 1.

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While furie gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QVINTVS, Potuisset (saith PETRARCH) in lectulo suo mori, potuisset integro cadauere sepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and beene with an vntorne and vndisseuered bodie buried; for as Petrach in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quàm desperantem (præsertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari; What more foolish then for him that despaires, especially of the effect, to be intangled with endlesse contentions? Whosoeuer therefore will set before him MACHIAVELS two markes to shoote at (to wit) riches, and glorie, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak woodden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first deuised to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne inuention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sailes, as the diuers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sailes and his cloth, of meane length and bredth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure nauigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whatsoeuer Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let vs resolue with S. Paul, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diuersities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

THe creation of all other creatures being finished, the heauens adorned, and the earth replenished, GOD said, Let vs make man in our owne Image, according to our likenesse. Gen. 1. 26.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to vs knowne, ingens miraculum homo, Man is the greatest wonder (saith PLATO out of MERCVRIVS:) Naturæ ardentissimæ artificium, The artificiall worke of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellencie externall, but in respect of his internall forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence immortall, and spirituall; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein. *Trist. More holy then the rest, and vnderstanding more,
A liuing creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Vt sicut Deus vnus, ab eo fieret homo vnus, & quomodò ex Deo vno omnia, ità ex vno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terræ: Vnus igitur vnum fecit, qui vnitatis eius haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be vpon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should haue the Image of his vnitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plurall number, and let them rule ouer the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortall soule onely, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible; as God is immortall and incorporall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorporall; and as there is but one God which gouerneth the world, so but one soule which gouerneth the bodie of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the bodie: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole bodie, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Iewes make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betweene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they distinguish betweene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threds, with subtile distinctions, many times the plainenesse and sinceritie of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolueth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantiall; but not the the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declaratiuum; A word declaring qualitie in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the sinfull soule doth not therefore leaue to be the image of God, but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Retractations maintayneth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoeuer the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoeuer the Fathers conceiue, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus
1. Cor. 15. 49. doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we beare the image of the heauenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoeuer Lombard hath said to the contrarie. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as S. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so S. Iames vseth the word (similitude) for both in these
Iam. 3. 9. words: Therewith bl esse we God euen the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God: Howsoeuer therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind
Vt supra. of elegancie in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Confitemur imaginem in aeternitate, similitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spirituall dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi verò possit esse imago
Aug. vt supr. aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omninò similis non est, procùl dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likenesse, there is no image. The verie words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likenesse: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) onely, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguitie, in the first Verse of the fift Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe by it selfe, as, In the day that God created ADAM, in the likenesse of God made he him. And Vers. 1. this similitude S. Paul Colos. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleeue S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the wordes directly in one sense.
Rom. 1. 23. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both Zanch. de op. Dei l. 3. ca. 1. in bodie and minde: Nulla pars in homine quae non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of bodie and soule. The bodie of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his bodie must needes be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he alleageth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the bodie onely: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. AVGVSTINE,) Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans bodie. Deus enim non est humanae formae particeps, neque corpus humanum diuinae (saith PHILO,) God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shaddam; Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphitæ, against the verie essence and Maiestie of God.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderſtanding then theſe groſſe Heretikes: Ad ſimilitudinem Dei proprius accedebat humana virtus, quàm figura; The vertue which is in man (ſaith he) came neerer the ſimilitude of God, then the figure. For God is a ſpirituall ſubſtance, inuiſible, and moſt ſimple; God is a iuſt God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitie it ſelfe, and (in a word) Goodneſſe it ſelfe, and none elſe ſimply good. And thus much it hath pleaſed God himſelfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himſelfe. What then can be the ſhadow of ſuch a ſubſtance, the image of ſuch a nature, or wherein can man be ſaid to reſemble his vnexcogitable power and perfectneſſe? certainely, not in dominion alone: for the Deuill is ſaid to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdome of Chriſt was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, becauſe man hath an immortall ſoule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderſtanding, and Will, for the Deuils are alſo immortall, and participate thoſe faculties, being called Dæmones, becauſe ſcientes of Knowledge, and ſubtilitie; neither becauſe we are reaſonable creatures, by which we are diſtinguiſhed from beaſts: for who haue rebelled againſt God? who haue made Gods of the vileſt beaſts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of ſhamefull parts, of luſts and pleaſures, but reaſonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of S. Chryſoſtome and Ambroſe, as touching dominion, but that, in reſpect thereof, man was in ſome ſort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, ſuch as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Iuſtice and Pietie: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Gouernor ouer the Fiſhes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beaſts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude Reaſon, as it is the abilitie of Vnderſtanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Irenæus did therefore call man, the image of God, becauſe he was animal rationale onely; but that he vnderſtood it better, with SYBILLA: Imago mea eſt homo, rectam rationem habens: Man, that is endued with right reaſon, is ſaid to reſemble God, (that is) by right reaſon to know and confeſſe God his Creatour, and the ſame God to ſerue, loue, and obey: and therefore ſaid Saint Auguſtine (who herein came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & ſimilitudinem ſuam in mente, God made man, in reſpect of the intellect, after his owne Image and ſimilitude; and REYNERIVS; Homo, quòd habet mentem, factus eſt ad imaginem Dei, Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

BVt Mens is not taken here for anima phyſica, according to Ariſtotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall ſtrength of the minde, or ſoule, cuius actus eſt perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whoſe act, exerciſe, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is alſo called intellectus diuinus, intellectus contemplatiuus, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderſtanding, and an intellect or minde contemplatiue. Eſt autem mens noſtra (ſaith CVSANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compoſitum: Our intellectuall minde (ſaith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehenſion: vnto which Mercurius attributeth ſo much (if his meaning accompany his words) that hee eſteemeth it to be the very eſſence of God (which was alſo the errour of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwiſe ſeparate from God (ſaith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderſtanding (ſaith MERCVRIVS) eſt Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the ſame eſſence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; ſo is this Mens or vnderſtanding in men, not of the eſſence of Gods infinite vnderſtanding, but a power and faculty of our ſoules the pureſt; or the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call animam animæ, The ſoule of the ſoule, or with S. Auguſtine, the eye of the ſoule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, quæ amorē ſapientiæ tanquàm ducē ſequitur, Which followeth after the loue of ſapience as her guide (ſaith Philo) betweene which and reaſon, betweene which and the mind, called anima, between which & that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reaſon is that facultie by which we iudge and diſcourſe; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is ſaid, Anima corpus animat, id eſt, viuificat; or the ſoule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueth it life: for death is the ſeparation of body and ſoule; and the ſame ſtrength (ſaith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the ſame hath this Anima, or mind, or ſoule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Baſil agreeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderſtanding, perſpicacem animæ partem, the perceiuing part of the mind, or the light by which the Soule diſcerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, ſopitur, & in furioſis mens extinguitur, anima manet, In men that ſleepe it is this (mens) or vnderſtanding, and not the mind or ſoule, which reſteth, during which time it is but habitual in wiſe men, & in mad men this (mens) is extinguiſhed, and not the ſoule: for mad men doe liue, though diſtract.

Therefore this word being often vſed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abuſiuely to mad men, when we ſay that they are of a diſtract minde, in ſtead of a broken vnderſtanding, which word (mind) we vſe alſo for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that mind: and ſometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honeſt minde, or, a man of a iuſt minde: ſometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mindes ſake; and Ariſtotle ſometimes vſeth this word (Mens) for the phantaſie, which is the ſtrength of the imagination: ſometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without diſcourſe: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is vſed in the proper ſignification, including both the vnderſtanding agent and poſſible, it is deſcribed to bee a pure, ſimple, ſubſtantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that which is intelligible, as to his firſt obiect: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderſtand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from paſſion comming from without, and apt to bee diſſeuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently MERCVRIVS: Anima eſt imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præeſt, mens animæ, anima corpori; The Soule (meaning that which giueth life) is the Image of this vnderſtanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderſtanding is the Image of God. God is Preſident or Ruler ouer this vnderſtanding, this vnderſtanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the bodie. This diuiſion and diſtinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetickes, I leaue to the Reader to iudge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marſilius Ficinus in his ninth Booke of the Soules immortalitie laboureth to proue. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (ſayth he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo, tanquàm medio, per quod intelligat, quanquàm eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat: hoc autem obiectum ſunt phantaſmata, ſeù rerum à ſenſibus perceptarum ſimulachra ad phantaſiam prolata: To exerciſe the facultie of vnderſtanding, the mind of man (ſayth he) needeth no inſtrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderſtand: but it needeth an obiect, whereon to looke, and whence to conceiue the act of vnderſtanding. This obiect are the phantaſmes, or the reſemblances of things receiued from the ſenſe & caryed to the phantaſie: But in effect his concluſion ſeemeth to carry a contrary ſenſe, when he maketh the Phantaſie, in repreſenting the obiect to the vnderſtanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderſtood to be an Organũ of any thing; but of the vnderſtanding. And he addeth that the reſemblance of things in mans imaginatiõ, are to his vnderſtanding & mind, as colours are to the ſight: whence it ſo followeth, that the imagination or phantaſie it ſelf is to the facultie of vnderſtanding, as the eye is to the faculty of ſeeing; & as this is an organum, ſo that. Of this queſtion, How the minde in all her actions maketh vſe of the bodie, & hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a moſt graue & learned Diſcourſe in the laſt Reply of M. D. Bilſon, late Biſhop of Wincheſter, vnto Henry Iacob. Howſoeuer the Truth be determined, we muſt conclude, that it is neither in reſpect of reaſon alone, by which we diſcourſe, nor in reſpect of the minde it ſelfe by which wee liue, nor in reſpect of our ſoules ſimply, by which we are immortall, that wee are made after the Image of God. But moſt ſafely may we reſemble our ſelues to God in mente, and in reſpect of that pure facultie which is neuer ſeparate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infuſion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to bee after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed, intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint AVGVSTINE) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum à quo facta est, (that is) The minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembreth, vnderstandeth, and loueth it selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum verò imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit: & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiæ affectibus immersit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of GOD, but sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it vnprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscence.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortalitie, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shaddow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, wee are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteousnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberalitie, that we were printed with the seale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioyned to the soule is a part of the Essentiall Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and contriued within the Trunke of Dust and Clay, the inimitable habilitie of his owne Pietie, and Righteousnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retaine the Image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office or Magistracie to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retayne this Image, as they feare, loue and serue God truly, that is, for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruise and deface his Seale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sinnes. For the vniust minde cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for God is Charitie, and Mercie it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Sathan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with GOD; and to be short, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, betweene beautie & deformity, or betweene righteousnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receiue this Image of Gods goodnesse which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and dureleſſe pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shaddow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanshippe of GODS Wisedome, and the liberalitie of his Mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impuritie of our flesh, behold the highest Heauens, and thence bring Knowledge and Obiect to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during Glorie, and termeleſſe Ioy, prepared for those, which retaine the Image and similitude of their Creatour, preseruing vndefiled and vnrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of GOD, is created in Righteousnes and Holinesse, as saith S. Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by Saint Augustine, with whom Saint Ambrose ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Diuine Grace and heauenly Glorie, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, I, that am but dust and ashes: And In these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabite, according to Iob. And though our owne eyes doe euery-where behold the sudden and resistlesse assaults of Death, and Nature assureth vs by neuer-stiling Experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Anduiles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Hiues ōf vnnumbred cares, sorrowes and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which Enuie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true vnhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that wee only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of death; and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-liuing subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that wee examine this great account? Neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: wee plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches whiles our strength enableth vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that we must goe the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for vs in the darke; And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues,) we behold therein the fearefull Images of our actions past, and withall this terrible Inscription: That God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But what examples haue euer mooued vs? what perswasions reformed vs? or what threatnings made vs afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaid before vs, we heare what is promised and threatned: but the Worlds bright glorie hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights, (with which wee only see) doe neither looke vp towards termelesse ioyes, nor downe towards endlesse sorrowes, till wee neither know, nor can looke for any thing else, at the Worlds hands. But let vs not flatter our immortall Soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that wee neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that wee offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which wee trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) euen a contemptuous laughing to scorne, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Frustrà sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselues with Gods mercie.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcasse God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing Soule: (that is) God gaue a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spirituall and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortalitie into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith ELIHV in IOB) hath made me, and the breath of the Almightie hath giuen me Life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, nè forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs suis inspirâsse in faciem formati, vt viuere posset & spiraculum vitæ habere: Nam & Propheta cùm ait, Manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hâc locutione magis quàm propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudinẽ, qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggerlinesse of carnall sense is to be auoided, lest perhaps we should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that he might liue, and haue the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet also when he saith; Thy hands haue made me, spake this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi hijs, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that reade the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, quæ viuificat corpus, & animat, Which doth animate, and giue life to the bodie. The inspiration of the Almightie giueth vnderstanding, saith Iob; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the bodie returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (spirit) vsually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Iesus, receiue my spirit: and in S. IOHN, And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue vp the ghost, or spirit, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the soules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence receiued life: so shall they againe be dissolued into the same first matter, when they were taken: but the life of breath euerlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gaue it.

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom hee made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which hee might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose Image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, he vouchsafed vnto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper rationall belonging vnto man, and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE:) Homo est vtriusq; naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, dum, in breui magnum, atq; exiguo totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World, the great and large World in the smal and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of Man, and therefore heauie and lumpish; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which OVID:

From thence our kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approouing, that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His bloud, which dispersеth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carryed by Brookes and Riuers ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moisture, Oyle, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heate feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitie of the Earth; the haires of mans bodie, which adornes or ouer-shaddowes it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generatiue power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering & vnstable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our eies, to the light of the Sun and Moone, and the beautie of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat dry vp, and wither away, or the fierce puffes of winde blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne image and similitude: And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for in Angelis deprehensa est stultitia, Behold, hee found folly in his Angels (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteousnesse. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee seeme onely to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein wee are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Loue, Desire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we beginne to take accompt of our times, iudge of our selues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seuenth to Saturne, wherin our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we find by deare and lamentable experience, & by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more wee are accompanied with plentie, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made vnsociable to others, we become a burthen to our selues: being of no other vse, then to hold the riches we haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on vnto, with many sighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which wee alwaies trauel both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honor & riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soeuer we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose dores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Streame, but neuer floweth againe: our Leafe once fallen, springeth no more,

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the sap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserued, doth euermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himselfe.

THese be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankinde, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrayned will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall Life, a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to bee his owne guide, his owne Workeman, and his owne Painter, that hee might frame or describe vnto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his owne counsaile. Ecclus.15.14. Such was the liberalitie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change; and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpeuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which soeuer he tooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was ænigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were tranformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutalitie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Crueltie, and from Iustice to Oppression. For by the liuely Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceiuers; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to lust and sensualitie; by Wolues, rauening, and greedie Men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false prophers, Which come to you in sheepes clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolues: by the images of stones and stockes, foolishand ignorant men; by Vipers, vngratefull men: of which S. IOHN BAPTIST, O yee generation of Vipers, &c. Matth.7.15. Matth.3.7.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Vniuersall created was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the creatures therein to themselues: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I worke; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, (but as afore-said) gaue vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselues; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their seuerall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made euery Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gaue to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man hauing a free will and liberall choice, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed: but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contayned, reserued by God to repleniſh the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seate of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no maruell that men should erre.

COncerning the first Habitation of man we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2.6. Of this seate and place of Paradise, all Ages haue held dispute; and the opinions and iudgements haue beene in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceiued the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographie, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heauens) the way how to find out and iudge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein hee was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselues ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one Errour is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousnesse thereof bee not timely restrayned. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselues to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obseruant Sectatours of those Masters, whom they admired and beleeued in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores (magnorum virorum auctoritate persuasi) transmittimus; Wee passe ouer many grosse errours, by the authoritie of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselues their owne weakenesse:

Nulli

Nulli vnquam dedit omnia Deus; God neuer gaue the knowledge of all things to any one. S. Paul confeſt that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the fleſh, or out of the fleſh; and Chriſt himſelfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, ſeeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wiſe. Sapientia vbi inuenitur? (ſaith Iob) but where is wiſedome found? and where is the place of vnderſtanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the liuing. And therefore ſeeing God found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabite in houſes of clay) cannot be without their miſtakings: and ſo the Fathers, and other learned men excuſable in particulars, eſpecially in thoſe whereupon our ſaluation dependeth not.

A recitall of ſtrange opinions, touching Paradiſe.

NOw touching Paradiſe, firſt it is to be inquired, whether there were a Paradiſe, or no? or whether Moſes deſcription were altogether myſticall, & allegoricall? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of thoſe foure Riuers, Piſon, Gehon, Hidekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other myſteries and ſignifications; as, that by the foure Riuers were meant the foure Cardinall vertues, Iuſtice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Honny. This Allegoricall vnderſtanding of Paradiſe by Origen diuulged, was againe by Franciſcus Georgius receiued, (ſaith Sixtus Senenſis) whoſe friuolous imaginations Sixtus himſelfe doth fully and learnedly anſwere, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Booke. fol. 338. the laſt Edition.

Bartaſ. ſem. 2. l. 1. 143.

S. Ambroſe alſo leaned wholly to the Allegoricall conſtruction, and ſet Paradiſe in the third Heauen, and in the vertues of the mind, & in noſtro principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our ſoules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this ſort. By the place or garden of Paradiſe, was meant the ſoule or mind; by Adam, Mens, or Vnderſtanding; by Eue, the Senſe; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the reſt of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence ſpringing. Notwithſtanding all which, vpon the firſt of the Corinth. cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celeſtiall and terreſtriall Paradiſe; the one, into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chryſamenſis was of opinion, that a Paradiſe had beene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth: the ſame being not only defaced, but withall the places now not ſo much as exiſting. To which Luther ſeemeth to adhere.

Amb. de Parad.

The Manichees alſo vnderſtood, that by Paradiſe was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceiue his words in two ſeuerall places. Firſt, vpon this: Fill the earth, GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipſo etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuerſis animantibus, ſubijcite terram, clariſſime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (vt tum erat) fructibus conſitam, ſedem & hortum illum Adæ, & poſteritatis futuræ fuiſſe; These words (ſaith he) in which God ſaid, Bring forth fruite and multiplie, and fill the earth, and ſubdue it and rule ouer euery creature, doe cleerely ſhew, that the Vniuerſall earth ſet or filled with all ſorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and ſeate of ADAM, and of his future poſteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts the 17. Apoſtolus ex vno ſanguine omne genus humanum adeo factum docet, vt habitarent ſuper vniuerſam faciem terræ: tota igitur terra Paradiſus ille erat; The Apoſtle (ſaith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one bloud all mankinde, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (ſaith hee) was that Paradiſe. Which coniectures I will anſwere in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was firſt planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth neere the Riuer of Aceſines, in the confines of India.

Vad. l. 2. de Poet. fol. 26.

Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus, make Paradiſe vnder the Æquinoctiall, and Poſtellus, quite contrarie, vnder the North pole: the Chaldeans alſo for the moſt part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradiſe a figure, or Sacrament only, or elſe would haue it ſeated out of this ſenſible word, or rayſed into ſome high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Raba-

Bart. 16. 116.

Rabanus, were both sicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Iudeus, that he wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus; By what euill Angell he was blowne vp into this error: so can I not but greatly maruaile at the learned men, who so grosly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, doe so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riuers which watered it, and by the points of the Compasse vpon which it lay, in respect of Iudea, or Canaan.

Red in Gen. Pet. Comest. l. 1. cap. 3. Moses Barc de Par.

Nouiomagus also, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleeueth that all the earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beautie adscribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountaine, from whence the foure Riuers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Ægypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

To the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And howsoeuer the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauerat Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the seuentie Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, & for a Noune appellatiue; which Region, in respect of the fertilitie of the soile, of the many beautifull Riuers, and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwaies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantnesse or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida, was a Countrie, so called for the flourishing beautie thereof, so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacie, for the pleasure, or delicacie: and as Florida signifieth flourishing: so Eden signifieth pleasure, & yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seate of all that Region, Paradise was truely the Garden of Eden, and truely the Garden of Pleasure.

Gen. cap. 2.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Seuentie; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodoret, Gregorie, and to the Rabines, as Rambun, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Seuerinus, Damascenus &c. who plainely take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damascens owne words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter consitus; Paradise is a place, marueilously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both vnderstand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words: After this I will begin to speake of Paradise terrestriall, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantâsse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; MOSES enim clarissimè prodit, Paradisum à Deo consitum in regione terræ Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Hedan autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. vbi legimus CAIN habitâsse ad Orientalem plagam Heden. For MOSES (saith (ſaith he) doth ſhew moſt cleerely, that Paradiſe was planted of God in a Region of the Eaſt Countrie, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Geneſis, where we reade, that CHAM dwelt on the Eaſt border of Heden. PERERIVS endeuoureth to qualifie this tranſlation: for this particle (ſaith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very firſt day; alleaging this place of Chriſt that although the Deuill was ſaid to be a man-ſlayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the ſixth day. But ſurely, as I thinke (referring my ſelfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the inſtant of his fall a man-ſlayer in diſpoſition, though he had not whereon to practiſe till mans creation. And for concluſion, S. Hierome (if that be his tranſlation) aduiſeth himſelfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Geneſis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did ſet a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden, Collocauit Deus ante Paradiſum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himſelfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true ſenſe of this place, preciſely taken, according to the Hebrew. Poſuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; He ſet on the Eaſt-ſide of the Garden of Heden, Cherubin. BEGANVS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) ſignifieth (with) as well as (in) and ſo the Text beareth this ſenſe; That God planted a Garden with pleaſure (that is to ſay) full of pleaſure. But Beganus followeth this conſtruction, onely to the end, to find Paradiſe vpon the Riuer of Aceſines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great aboundance, which he ſuppoſeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good, and euill, and would therefore draw Paradiſe to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will anſwere hereafter.

Iohn 8. 44.

Gen. 3. 24.

Now, becauſe Paradiſe was ſeated by Moſes toward the Eaſt, thence came the cuſtome of praying towards the Eaſt, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built Eaſt and Weſt, as to the point where the Sunne riſeth in March, which is directly ouer Paradiſe (ſaith Damaſcenus:) affirming, that wee alwayes pray towards the Eaſt, as looking towards Paradiſe, whence we were caſt out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Prieſts and Sacrifices, which turned them ſelues in their ſeruice and diuine ceremonies, alwayes towards the Weſt, thereby to auoid the ſuperſtition of the Ægyptians and Chaldeans.

But becauſe Eaſt and Weſt are but in reſpect of places; (for although Paradiſe were Eaſt from Iudea, yet it was Weſt from Perſia) and the ſeruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, ſo our hearts ſtand right, other than this, that we who dwell weſt from Paradiſe, and pray turning our ſelues towards the Eaſt, may remember thereby to beſeech God, that as by Adams fall we haue loſt the Paradiſe on Earth: ſo by Chriſts death and paſſion wee may bee made partakers of the Paradiſe celeſtiall, & the Kingdom of Heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other myſterie in adding the word (Eaſt) to Eden by Moſes, then to ſhew, that the Region of Eden; in which Paradiſe was, lay Eaſtward from Iudea and Canaan; for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of thoſe Nations, the Sonnes of the Eaſt, which inhabited Arabia, Meſopotamia, Chaldea, and Perſia: of which Ouid:

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabataeaq́, regna receſſit,
Perſidaq́, & radijs iuga ſubdita matutinis.

The Eaſt wind with Aurora hath abiding
Among th' Arabian, and the Perſian Hils, Whom Phœbus firſt ſalutes at his vp-riſing.

And if it be obiected, that Hieremie the Prophet threatning the deſtruction of Hieruſalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in reſpect of thoſe nations that followed Nabuchodonoſor, and of whom the greateſt part of his Armie was compounded; not that Babylon it ſelfe ſtood North from Hieruſalem, though inclining from the Eaſt towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Tranſlation, Peter Comeſtor giueth beſt ſatisfaction: for he vſeth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the firſt part of the World, (à principio) id eſt (ſaith he) à prima orbis parte, and afterward he affirmeth, that (à principio, and ad Orientem) haue the ſame ſignification; From the beginning & Eaſt-ward is all one, à principio idem eſt quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the proofe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegoricall, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Verſ. in theſe words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow euery Tree pleaſant to the ſight, & good for meate, &c. ſo as firſt it appeared that God created Adam elſewhere, as in the World at large, & then, put him into the Garden: and the end why, is expreſt: that he might dreſſe it & keepe

Verse 18. keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestiall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer; expressing also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which hee calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrie neere vnto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

Verse 10. Ezech. 27. 23.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit EVA de arbore, non est ADAM, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias reuocantur: If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountaine, and then no Riuer, if no Riuer, then no such foure heads or branches, and then not any such Riuer as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such Fig-tree, or fruit, or leaues, EVE then did not eate of the fruit, neither was there any ADAM, or any man, the truth was but a Fable, and all things esteemed are called backe into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon DANIEL: Conticescant eorum deliramenta, qui vmbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur euertere veritatem, vt Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegorias Legibus se debere subruere, Let the dotage of them be silent, who following shadowes and Images in the Truth, endeuour to subuert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Riuers and the Trees vnder the rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gaue Adam free libertie to eate of euery Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eate; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmaticall or Mysticall, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings vseth this speech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him, which proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to be terrestiall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainely, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (one of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Riuers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbeleeuing Israelites and others after them, would haue misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would haue beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had beene an Vtopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrha stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the fiue principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnaturall sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar; In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proueth plainely, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beautie and fertilitie, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a scare and soyle of farre exceeding excellencie.

Ezech. 31. 9.

Gen. 13. 10.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous Gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their prayses of the Elizian fields, but out of the Storie of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ouid:

Ouid. Metam. l. 1

Vere erat aeternum, placidi, tepentibus auris
Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The ioyfull spring did euer last, | Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,
And Zephyrus did breede | Without the helpe of seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Secta-

Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the ſtolne Treaſures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and diſguiſed by poeticall conuerſions, as if they had bin conceiued out of their owne ſpeculations and contemplations.

But beſides all theſe teſtimonies, if we finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the Riuer that ran out of it, and that the ſame afterwards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hauila and Cuſh, & that all theſe are Eaſtward from Canaan, or the Deſerts of the Amorites, where Moſes wrote; I then conceiue, that there is no man that will doubt, but that ſuch a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegoricall ſenſe of the Scripture; for aſwell in this there were many figures of Chriſt, as in all the old Teſtament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithſtanding. And to this purpoſe (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) Tres ſunt de Paradiſo generales ſententiæ: vna eſt eorum, qui tantummodò corporaliter Paradiſum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui ſpiritualiter tantùm (id eſt) Eccleſiam: tertia eorum, qui vtroq; modo Paradiſum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradiſe: the one of thoſe men, which will haue it altogether corporall: a ſecond of thoſe which conceiue it altogether ſpirituall, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of thoſe, which take it in both ſenſes; which third opinion S. Auguſtine approueth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: Quemadmodum homo ſenſibilis, & intelligibilis ſimul conditus erat: ſic & huius ſanctiſſimum nemus, ſenſibile ſimul & intelligibile, & duplici ſpecie eſt præditum, (that is) As man was created at one time both ſenſible and intelligible: ſo was this holy Groue or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 13. c. 21. Suidas in verbo Paradiſus.

§. IV.

Why it ſhould be needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradiſe.

BVt it may be obiected, that it is needleſſe, and a kind of curioſitie to enquire ſo diligently after this place of Paradiſe, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vſe. To which I anſwer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our inſtruction; and if the truth of the Storie be neceſſarie, then by the place proued, the ſame is alſo made more apparent. For if wee ſhould conceiue that Paradiſe were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was ſaid to wade through the Sea, and thence to haue come into Iudea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could ſeeme more ridiculous then the report of ſuch a place? and beſides, what maketh this ſeate of Paradiſe ſo much diſputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Piſhon ſhould be Ganges, which watereth the Eaſt India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Ægypt, and theſe two Riuers ſo farre diſtant, as (except all the World were Paradiſe) theſe ſtreames can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Sauiour, were ſaid to haue beene in ſome ſuch Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I aſſure my ſelfe, that the Chriſtian Religion would haue taken but a ſlender roote in the mindes of men: for times and places are approued witneſſes of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we ſhould rely, or giue place to the iudgement of ſome Writers vpon this place of Geneſis (though otherwiſe for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour & reuerence) I ſay that there is no fable among the Grecians or Ægyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleeue that there were a piece of the World ſo ſet by it ſelfe & ſeparated, as to hang in the Ayre vnder the circle of the Moone? or who ſo doltiſh to conceiue, that from thence the foure riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, ſhould fall downe, and run vnder all the Ocean, & riſe vp againe in this our habitable world, & in thoſe places where they are now found? Which leſt any man think, that I enforce or ſtraine to the worſt, theſe are Peter Comeſtors own words. Eſt autẽ locus amœniſſimus, longo terræ & maris tractu à noſtra habitabili Zona ſecretus, adeò eleuatus, vt vſq; ad lunarẽ globũ attingat, &c. (that is) It is a moſt pleaſãt place, ſeuered frõ our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, eleuated ſo, that it reacheth to the Globe of the Moone.

And Moſes Barcephas vpon this place writeth in this maner: Deinde hoc quoq; reſponſũ volumus, Paradiſũ multò ſublimiore poſitum eſſe regione, atq; hac noſtra extet terra, eoq; fieri vt vt illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluuij tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eoq; impetu impulsi pressiq; sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, vnde rursus prosiliant ebulliantq; in hoc à nobis culto orbe. which haue this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we giue this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised aboue this part which we inhabite; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Riuers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried vnder the deepe Ocean, and doe againe rise and boyle vp in this our habitable World. and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; vltra Oceanũ ita positum esse, vt totũ terrarũ orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Lunæ orbis Lunã cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compasse or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on euery side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therfore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discouer the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdome appointed in the very Nauel of this our World, and (as Melanchton saies) in parte terræ meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre, the Vniuersal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, & of the worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselues after the floud, into all other remote regions & countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, & out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Ancester, from whence all the streames & branches of Mankind haue followed & bin deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine seueral opinions before remembred, by the Truth it selfe; & to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Floud hath not vtterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hils in the Earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chysamensis, that the Floud hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Floud the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for mine owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot denie, but that the face of Paradise was after the Floud withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remayned, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeares after the Floud, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the verie Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Floud, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Riuers stil remaine the same Riuers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay; & learning out one of these Riuers, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a Riuer to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision & branching of those riuers must be in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the riuers run as they doe, North & South) & therfore these riuers yet remaining, & Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the floud, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages know it not, so is there no probability, that that eyther these Riuers were turned out of their courses, or new Riuers created by the Floud which were not, or that the Floud (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hils, or deepe Vallies. For what descent of waters could there be in a Spherical and round bodie, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is eyther by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or floud of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are most inraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to passe vpon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, vntill the waters sanke, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the wind to blow, to drye vp the abundant slime and mudde of the Earth, and make the Land more firme, and to cleanse the Ayre of thicke vapours, and vnwholsome mists; and this we know by experience, that all downe-right raines doe euermore dissever the violence of outragious windes, and beat downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbes and flouds there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one heighth ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulfes to receiue a Floud, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, then that they moued with any raging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Floud made no such destroying alteration, Ioseph. auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his dayes, which Pillars were set vp aboue 1426. yeares before the Floud, counting Seth to be an hundred yeares old at the erection of them; and Ioseph himselfe, to haue liued some fortie or fiftie yeares after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleeue all that he wrote, yet that, which hee auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) bee called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such Pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch, built by Cain, about the Mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines therof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented Fragment) saith, were to be seene in his daies, who liued in the Reigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile; and if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent. For, speaking of this Citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Ciuitas Cain, vt nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in these things) that the Citie of Ioppa was built before the Floud, ouer which Cepha was King: whose name with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine Altars of stone; and it is not vnpossible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Annius, might bee seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first City of the world, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it. Gen. 4. 17.

Gen. 2. 10.

Gen. 8. 1.

And to proue directly, that the floud was not the cause of Mountains, but that there were Mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the floud ouerflowed by fifteene Cubits the highest Mountaines. And Masius Damascenus speaking of the Floud, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos fermo est diluuij tempore liberatos. And vpon Minyada there is an high Mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselues thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saued then eight persons (which Masius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such Mountaines were before the Floud, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; & on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntruely, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Floud: on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saued themselues also; but (as Annius saith) without all authoritie, either Diuine or Humane.

Lastly,

Lastly, it appeareth that the Floud did not so turne vpside-downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this that when NOAH sent out the Doue the second time, she returned with an Oliue-leafe in her mouth, which she had pluckt, and which (vntill the Trees were discouered) she found not: for otherwise she might haue found them floting on the water; a manifest proofe, that the Trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written: folium Oliuæ, raptum or decerptum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to teare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrarie) that the Floud made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation; and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouerie.

Gen. 8. 11.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to be the fountaine of those foure Riuers.

THis conceit of Aug. Chrysanensis being answered, who onely giueth his opinion for reason, I wil in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Nouiomagus, Vadianus, Goropius Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alleageth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule ouer euerie Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one blood all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which hee was Lord and Gouernor, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of bloud originally; and Adams Posteritie inhabited in processe of time ouer all the face of the Earth; yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and cultiue, in which hee liued in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choice, but that Adam had bin left to the Vniuersall; Moses would not then haue said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West, but respectiuely. And to what end had the Angell of God beene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Vniuersall had beene Paradise? for then must Adam haue beene chased also out of the World. For if All the Earth were Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction then this, That Adam was driuen out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleeue with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to denie, he thinkes all one, as to affirme, That in so large a field, as the Vniuersall, there should grow but one Thistle. NOVIOMAGVS vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Riuers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so farre distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

Gen. 1. 28.
Acts 17. 26.
Gen. 2. 8.
3. 24.

And it is true, that those foure Riuers, being so vnderstood, there could be no coniecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Pison was falsly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsly for Nilus, although Ganges be a Riuer by Hauilah in India, and Nilus run through Æthiopia. The Seuentie write Chus for Æthiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Nouiomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their coniecture farre more probable, then that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated farre beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Caluary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeares after the Floud, yet Adams shin-bones must haue contayned a thousand fadome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needes no argument to disproue it.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of their opinion, which make Paradiſe as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the Ayre.

THirdly, whereas Beda ſaith, and as the Schoole-men affirme, Paradiſe to be a place, altogether remoued from the knowledge of men (locus à cognitione hominum remotiſsimus) and Barcephas conceiued, that Paradiſe was farre in the Eaſt, but mounted aboue the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius layes it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Maſter Rabanus:) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographie of Paradiſe, doth not much differ from the reſt, but findes it ſeated next or neereſt heauen; It may ſeeme, that all theſe borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neyther of them (as I conceiue) well vnderſtood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for Heauen it ſelfe, into which the Soules of the bleſſed were carried after death.

True it is, that theſe Philoſophers durſt not for feare of the Areopagites (in this and many other diuine apprehenſions) ſet downe what they beleeued in plaine termes, eſpecially Plato: though Socrates in the end ſuffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Deuill himſelfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wiſeſt man. Iuſtine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Auguſtine gaue this iudgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Chriſtian. And it ſeemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Euſebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforeſaid, meant the celeſtiall Paradiſe, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothonos) which being aboue all Clouds of Raine, or other inconuenience, the people (by reaſon of their ſo many yeares) are called Macrobici (that is) Long-liued. A further Argument is vſed, for proofe of the height of this place, becauſe therein was Enoch preſerued from the violence of the floud: approued by Iſidore, and Peter Lombard; in which place alſo Tertullian conceiued, that the bleſſed Soules were preſerued till the laſt iudgement; which Irenæus, and Iuſtine Martyr alſo beleeued. But this opinion was of all Catholique Diuines reproued, and in the Florentine Counſell damned; of which Saint Auguſtine more modeſtly gaue this iudgement: Sicut certum eſt, ENOCH & ELIAM nunc viuere: ita vbi nunc ſunt: an in Paradiſo an alibi, incertum eſt; (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now liue; ſo where they now liue, in Paradiſe or elſewhere, it is vncertaine. But Barcephas giues a third cauſe, though of all other the weakeſt. For (ſaith he) it was neceſſarie that Paradiſe ſhould be ſet at ſuch a diſtance and height, becauſe the foure Riuers (had they not fallen ſo precipitate) could not haue had ſufficient force to haue thruſt themſelues vnder the great Ocean, and afterward haue forced their paſſage through the earth, and haue riſen againe in the farre diſtant Regions of India, Ægypt, and Armenia.

Diog. Laert. in Sca.

Iuſtin. Mart. adm. ad Gent. Aug.

Theſe ſtrange fancies and dreames haue beene anſwered by diuers learned men long ſince, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing vpon this ſubiect; of whoſe arguments I will repeate theſe few: for to vſe long diſcourſe againſt thoſe things, which are both againſt Scripture and Reaſon, might rightly be iudged a vanitie in the Anſwerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is firſt therefore alleaged, that ſuch a place cannot be commodious to liue in: for being ſet ſo neere the Moone, it had beene too neere the Sunne, and other heauenly bodies. Secondly, becauſe it muſt haue beene too ioynct a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, becauſe the ayre in that Region is ſo violently moued, and carried about with ſuch ſwiftneſſe, as nothing in that place can conſiſt or haue abiding. Fourthly, becauſe the place betweene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptolemie and Alfraganus) is ſeuenteene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes a groſſe account about one hundred and twentie thouſand miles. Hereupon it muſt follow, that Paradiſe, being raiſed to this height, muſt haue the compaſſe of the whole earth for a Baſis and foundation. But had it bin ſo raiſed, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: ſeeing it would depriue vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those falls of waters, are deafe from their infancie, like those which dwell neere the Catadupæ, or ouer-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as fained. For I haue seene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them, are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hæc apud Basilium & Ambrosiũ in eorũ scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquã me legere memini; But I doe not remember (saith he) that I euer read those things, either in BASIL or AMBROSE.

Cicero Somn. Scip.

But for the bodies of Enoch & Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdome. Their taking vp might be into the celestiall Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and bloud, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heauen, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch & Elias, was easie to him that is Almightie. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the floud all perished on the earth, sauing eight persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

1. Cor. 15. 36. 51.

1. Pet. 3. 20.

For Tostatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleeued that Paradise was raised aboue the middle Region of the Aire, and twentie cubits aboue all Mountaines, that the floud did not therfore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleeued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouer-whelme it:) this is also contrarie to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction teacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flowed all the mountains vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Masius, Damascenus, & the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saued themselues on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Iordan; and as the floud was not naturall, so was Paradise saued by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleeued, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatiuely, for the delicacie and beautie so resembled. But this I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding wittie, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, then to resolue, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Olympus, Athos, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hils both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence washt off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolued vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinie himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet the heighth of these Mountaines is far vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thinne (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

Exod. 14. 21.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climats.

THose which come neerer vnto Reason, finde Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus: iudging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas obiecteth the distemperate heate, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa,) for although Paradise could not bee vnder the Line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that euerie Countrie, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Æquinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heat; It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countries which were situated directly vnder it, were of a distemper vninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceiued better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those daies it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beautie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the line it selfe. For hereof experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discouered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to prouide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by triall and the witnesse of mens trauailes, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitlesse lump to fashion out the rest. For God himselfe (saith ISAY) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated vnder the Æquinoctiall line, or neere it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easternely winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equall, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seen, neere the Line & vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions haue so many goodly Riuers, Fountaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, euer bearing, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit both greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vnclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not vnder ground into the root, fearing the iniury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered Husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terræ vitiosæ, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberall to all without labour, necessitie imposing no industrie or trauell, idlenesse bringeth forth no other fruits then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceiued in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoolemen were grosse in this particular.

Isay 45. 18.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlesyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of ESA. 37. and EZECH. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor vnder Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discouer and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembred, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we find that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subiected and inthralled.

Now besides those notable markes, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Iudæa; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Iudæa Eastward was Arabia Petræa; but in this region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not bee Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuers, as are expreſt to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessitie, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petræa, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertility, & the riuers only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in

Isai.37.v.12. these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by RABSAKEH: Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, & RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he pro-

Cap.27.vers.23. phecieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to auoid confusion, wee must vnderstand that there were 2. Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, where-

Cap.1.vers.1. of, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolitan: the second part is that Valley called Auenis, otherwise Conuallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Assyria is ioyned to Strabo. Arabia the Desart, & where Ptolemie placeth the City of Aueria: & the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cœlesyria, otherwise Vallis cana, or the hollow Valley, because the mountaines of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greeke is Cana in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lye East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleeued this Cœlesyria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise; though to giue Beroaldus his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, sauing, That hee fayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether misvnderstood two of the foure riuers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; wee must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith ESAIAH) Gosan, Haran, and Re-

Ezech.27.v.23. seph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath euer beene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterrane Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issicus, now Laiazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euerie Countrie yeelded: and hauing counted the seuerall People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them ex-

Vers.24. erciſed: They were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silke, and of broydered workes, fine linnen, corrall, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba & Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faires, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Fœlix yeeld: & because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countries yeelded;

and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them alſo all ſorts of ſpices, and plentie of gold. The better to conuey theſe commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balſara) thence ſent vp all theſe rich merchandiſes by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Weſtward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they paſt to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforeſaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited farre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, beſides thoſe proper commodities which themſelues had, and which they receiued out of Perſia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderſtandeth by Canneth, Seleucia, which is ſeated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hieroſolymitanus thinkes it to be Cteſiphon, but Cteſiphon is ſeated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that ſide, I meane on the Eaſt-ſide of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth Plin. l. 6. c. 26. the Schenite vpon Euphrates, where the ſame beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Deſart, and where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Deſart of Palmirena: for theſe people of Canneh (afterward Schenitæ) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, ſtretching themſelues from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Weſtward along the bankes of Euphrates, as far as the Citie of Thapſacus, where Ptolemie appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which alſo agreeth with the deſcription of the Schenitæ by Strabo, whoſe Strabo l. 16. words are theſe: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciâ & Babyloniâ euntibus iter eſt per Schenitas; The Merchants which trauaile frõ Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore thoſe which take Canneth for Charran, doe much miſtake it. For Gen. 11. 31. Charran, to which Abraham came from Vr in Chaldea (called by God) ſtandeth alſo in Meſopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it ſelfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are diſtinctly named with thoſe of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Aſhur, & Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran which is ſometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the ſame Charran of Meſopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Meſopotamia: or Aran fluuiorũ, the Greeke word (Meſopotamia) importing, a Country between riuers: for M. ſos in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluuius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it ſelfe, to which Abraham came from Vr (as aforeſaid.) For Strabo in the deſcription of Arabia, giueth that tract of Land from the borders of Cœleſyria, to the edge of Meſopotamia, to the Schenitæ, who alſo inhabited on both ſides of Euphrates, & were in after-ages accounted of theſe Arabians which inhabite Batanea, and the North part of the Deſarts, ſtretching theſelues toward the vnhabited Solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth betweene Syria, and Arabia the Deſart. So as theſe of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneth, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneth, or Chalne, by Seleucia for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witneſſe Appian;) and ſo Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Geneſis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, ſtanding in Triangle with Seleucia, and almoſt the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the Weſt of Seleucia, and the other oppoſite vnto it, where theſe riuers of Tigris and Euphrates are readie to ioyne. Therefore, which of theſe the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is vncertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine ſeat thereof, that ſo many other Cities did retaine a part of the name in ſo many ages after. Neither is it vnlikely, that theſe additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betweene the Eaſt and the Weſt, or the greater and the leſſe Canne, or betweene Canne the old, and the new: which additions to diſtinguiſh Cities by, are ordinarie in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other City ioyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the Iud. 1.

Iud. 1. Iudges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reuerterentur, peruenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in medio itinere contra Niniuen, vndecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran, (which is the mid-way against Niniuie) the eleuenth day.

Act. 7. 1. This Citie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this Citie is not doubted of: for it is not onely remembred in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and ouerthrow of Crassus the Romane, who for his vnsatiable greedinesse was called Gurges auaritiæ; The gulfe of auarice. Whereof Lucan:

With Roman bloud th'Assyrian Carre he defil'd.

But this Citie Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written
Gen. 10. 10. of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdomes was Babel, & Erech, & Acad, & Chalne, in the land of Sinaar or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar or neere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldæa, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Countrie: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Towre Babel; & the Towre, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proued in the eleuenth Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the Land of Shinar, and there
Vers. 2. they abode: in which Playne Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrods greatnes, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneh ioyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrians: and Esay in the threats of Senacherib against Hierusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telassar. But before I conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessarie to describe, those other Countries, which Ezechiel ioyneth therewith in the places before remembred, as, those of Vers. 7. Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreouer the sonnes of HAM were CVSH, &c. And the sonnes of CVSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, and RAAMAH, &c. And the sonnes of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after, CVSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceiue to the contrarie, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulfe (called afterward Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faires with the chiefe of all spices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrie, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Fœlix, and which ioyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselues to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrie Strabo calleth Strabo, l. 16. Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people haue an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East side of the Persian gulfe. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue beene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones: of which they had not only plentie of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Persica ora initio Insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi vniones gignantur: in alijs verò, clari & perlucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian gulfe, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred: and in other, verie cleare and shining stones. Now, the difference betweene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schin:)

but whatſoeuer the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthographie, their Countries and Habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Perſian Sea and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea; and ſo that place of the 72. Pſalme: expounded, Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this ſenſe: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, becauſe they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the ſame Riuer, vpon which the Edenites were ſeated: and ſo thoſe of Sheba, towards the Sea-coaſt, and vpon it, paſt vp the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine ſtreame, and ſo through the Region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandiſe toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Canneh, border Eden on the Weſt and Northweſt: ſo doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-eaſt. Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldæan Paraphraſt, which Countrie by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R:) which change the Hebrewes alſo often vſe.

Thus much of thoſe Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telaſſar: for theſe Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had deſtroyed; and this place of Telaſſar lay moſt conuenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and alſo to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now to make theſe things the more plaine, wee muſt remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death theſe Monarchies were vtterly diſioyned.

For it appeareth both in Eſay the 37. and in the ſecond of Kings, by the threats of Rabſache, the while the Armie of Aſſyria lay before Hieruſalem, that the Cities of Goſan, Haran, Reſeph, and the Edenites at Telaſſar, had reſiſted the Aſſyrians, though by them (in a ſort) maſtered and recouered. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue deſtroyed, as Goſan, and Haran, Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar? But it appeared manifeſtly after Senacheribs death, that theſe Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others ſubiection: for Eſar-Haddon held Aſſyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Armie of Senacherib, commanded by Rabſache which lay before Hieruſalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God deſtroyed: the King of Babel ſent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recouerie of his health, and his victory obtained ouer the Aſſyrians. After which ouerthrow, Senacherib himſelfe was ſlaine by his owne ſonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Eſar-Haddon ſucceeding him in Aſſyria. To the Babylonian Ambaſſadours ſent by Merodach, Ezechias ſhewed all his treaſures, aſwell proper as conſecrate, which inuited the Kings of Babylon afterward to vndertake their conqueſt and ſubuerſion. So as, the ſuſpition of warre encreaſing betweene Babylon and Aſſyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Aſſyria, were imployed to beare off the incurſions of the Aſſyrians; and their Garriſon-place was at Telaſſar: and the very word (Telaſſar) ſaith Iunius, ſignifying as much, as a Bulwarke againſt the Aſſyrians. This place Hieroſolymitanus takes for Reſem, others for Seleucia: but this Telaſſar is the ſame, which Am. Marcellinus in the Hiſtorie of Iulian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Perſia) calleth Thilutha in ſtead of Telaſſar, who deſcribeth the exceeding ſtrength thereof in his 24. Booke: It is ſeated in an Iſland of Euphrates vpon a ſteepe and vnaſſaultable Rocke, in ſo much as the Emperour Iulian durſt not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuenient place for a Garriſon againſt the Aſſyrians, being alſo a paſſage out of Meſopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adioyning were lodged to defend the ſame. This place Ptolomie calleth Teridata, hauing Reſeph (which he calleth Reſepha) on the left hand, and Canneh, (which he calleth Thelbe-canne) on the right hand, not farre from whence is alſo found the Citie of Mann-canne vpon Tigris, and all theſe ſeated together, as Eſay and Ezechiel haue ſorted them. But the vnderſtanding of theſe places is the more difficult, becauſe Aſſyria (which the Chaldæans call Aturia) and Meſopotamia, were ſo often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Aſſyria & Meſopotamia in Babylonia nomen tranſierunt (ſaith NIGER,) Aſſyria and Meſopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Laſtly, it appeareth by thoſe adiacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is ſeated, seated, as, by Charran or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Canneh and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantauerat autem IEHOVAH Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is: (saith he in his Annotations.) Iusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiæ & Mesopotamiæ, He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Easterne Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

§. X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia, which Epistles in the yeare 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andræas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes wee may haue some farther light for the proofe of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the Riuer Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the Riuer of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminencie.) It hath (saith hee) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called this name be swallowed vp, with the fame of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldæa. This Island of Eden hath vp the Riuer, and not farre beyond it, the Citie of Hasar-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosal or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Masius) it is not aboue twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mosal or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in these words. Iuxta autem Tigrim, Ciuitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sanè, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta neere vnto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimonie of Masius informed by the Christians that dwelt there (the Seat of whose Patriach it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mosal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated vpon Tigris, and in the neighbor-hood of Niniue; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quæ sunt circum Ciuitatem Mozal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Niniues; Of all the Cities & Townes which are about the Citie of Mozal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Niniue. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not farre off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the breast of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosal, and that ancient Citie, which Ptolomie and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineue, Philostratus, and Simeon Sethi, Mosula, and Iohn Lean Mosal, others Mosse, (though it bee not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher vpon the same Riuer of Tigris, neere Mosal: so that we are like to find this Ile of Eden hereabout. For the same Andræas Masius, which placeth it aboue Mosal, makes it to be below Hasan-chepha, which is vpon the same Riuer of Tigris.

The onely difficultie is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a Riuer of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnprobable. And yet if this were the meaning heere, we haue a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a Riuer of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath bin subiect to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world haue beene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other Languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after the floud called Shinar; and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the bankes of Tigris, betweene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Æthicus maketh mention, (not that latter Æthicus, Disciple of Callinicus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenæus called Istri, who liued in Ægypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Æthicus, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a Riuer of Phœnicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the Region named by Æthicus. For Æthicus makes it a Countrey, and not a Riuer, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Æthiopia, calling the land of Chus Æthiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the Riuer which watereth the Regions, (saith Æthicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which Riuer he calleth Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a Riuer, or Riuers, to water the Garden, both which Riuers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them trauerse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden containedalso some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitie thereof in diuers places, is not vnworthy the name of Eden. For in some part therof (saith Strabo) the leaues are alway green, & therfore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also STEPHANVS de vrbibus mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Cœlesyria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Riuers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seuentie and all others conuert Perath by Euphrates & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt: & all men vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Vatable.) And becaus that which I haue said of the Ile of Eden, shall not be subiect to the censure of selfe-inuention, I haue heere-vnder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as MASIVS (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, & haue to this day (at least in Queene Maries time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel vpon the Riuer of Tigris; hauing no sufficient authoritie to choose themselues a Patriarch (which cannot bee done without foure or three Metropolitane Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an Election as themselues had made: hauing three hundred yeare before that vpon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a couetous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitane Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselues together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And becaus all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had beene of one House and Family to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Vpon which occasion, and for the choice of a Gouernour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselues. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle: Verùm nos non acceptauimus neq; proclamauimus ipsum, sed subitò conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & Pagis quæ sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Niniues, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Insula quæ est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Persiæ, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selues out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Ninive, & out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella, and out of the Iland which lyeth in the middle of Tigris, gris, a Riuer of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the Riuer Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they vse these words: Neq; supersunt apud nos Metropolitæ, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbelæ, Episcopus Salmasti, Episcopus Adurbeigan, en è vestigio conuenimus in Insulam, quæ est intra Tigrim flumen, Edcn, fecimusq; compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among vs any Metropolitan Bishops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmastus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Iland Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betweene our selues, &c.

Now this Iland of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceiued, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better vnderstood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Iacobites, Maronitæ, and Cophti, he goeth on in these words: Mox audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuariò in illam quam modò dixi Tigris Insulam, quæ duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem ferè millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris vndiq; cincta, & à paucis alijs quàm Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Iland of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which Iland is situated about twelue miles aboue Mosel, containing very neere ten miles in compasse, and euerie where inuironed with a wall, inhabited by a few other men then Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: siue Geserta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hosan-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tigris Insulam rupi asperæ impositam; Aboue the aforesaid Iland of Tigris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this Iland of Geserta, Andrew Theuet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la riuiere du Tigre, & pense que c'est vne terre des plus fertiles de tonte l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liueth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petræa, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisond to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as aboue written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Riuers of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuers to rise from one streame.

BVt it may be obiected, that it is written in the Text, That a Riuer went out of Eden and not Riuers, in the plurall, which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: Et fluuius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Quæ verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluuius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluuij procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium, & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was diuided into foure heads: which words (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a Riuer was going forth of Eden (that is) Riuers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was diuided, and they became foure heads. The Tigurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine, for it conuerts it thus: Et fluuius egrediebatur de delicijs; And a Riuer went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluuius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a Riuer went out of the place of pleaſure: and ſo the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region moſt delightfull and fertile; and ſo alſo the word (inde) and thence was diuided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it ſelfe.

And for the word (Riuer) for Riuers, it is vſuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that ſeedeth Seed, the fruitfull Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew vſeth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and againe, We eate of the fruit of the Tree, in ſtead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themſelues from the preſence of God; In medio ligni Paradiſi; In the middle of the Tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is Dauid Kimhi, and Vatablus, who vpon this place of Geneſis ſay, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for vnumquodq; illorum, and hee giueth an inſtance in this queſtion it ſelfe, as, A Riuer (for Riuers) went out of Eden. Gen. 1. 11. 3. 2. 8.

And this anſwere out of diuers of the Learned, may, not without good reaſon, bee giuen to the obiection, That Moſes ſpeaketh but of one Riuer, from which the heads ſhould diuide themſelues. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reaſon, we may expound the foure heads, to bee foure notable paſſages into famous Countries. And ſo we may take the word (Riuer) Verſe the tenth for one Riuer (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuer, (after he is paſt the place, where we ſuppoſe Paradiſe to haue bin, diuides it ſelfe, & ere long yeeldeth foure notable paſſages into ſeuerall Countries, though not all the way downe ſtreame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuer downward, there is conueyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Aſſyria) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text ſpeaking of Hiddekel, as it riſeth from the Riuer of Eden, doth not ſay it compaſſeth or waſheth the whole Region of Aſſyria, (as it had vſed this phraſe of Piſon and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Aſſyria. The firſt branch Piſon, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Baſilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia, whence ariſeth the name of Paſi-tigris, (as it were) Piſo-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Hauila or Suſiana. The ſecond branch Gehon, is that which in Hiſtorians is Nabarſares or Narragas, for Nahar-ragas: both which names ſignifie flumen deriuatum (a Riuer deriued,) alſo Acracanus, quaſi Ranoſus, by reaſon of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the firſt ſeate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldæa and Arabia, and it is loſt at length in the Lakes of Chaldæa. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper ſtreame of Piſon, or Baſilius, which runneth into Hiddekel properly ſo called (that is, into Tigris) aboue Seleucia, where it ſheweth a paſſage vp Tigris into Aſſyria: where, becauſe at length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigris, hauing before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, ſo called per excellentiam, being the bodie of the Riuer Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But, be it a Riuer, or Riuers, that come out of Eden, ſeeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can bee no doubt, but that Paradiſe was not farre from theſe Riuers: for that Perath in Moſes is Euphrates, there can be no queſtion; and (indeed) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (ſaith Moſes) Eaſtwards towards Aſſur, as we find, that Tigris is the Riuer of Aſſyria propriè dicta, whoſe chiefe Citie was Ninive, as in Geneſis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Aſſur, and builded Ninive, which was the chiefe Citie of Aſſyria.

And as for the kind of ſpeech here vſed in the Text, ſpeaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuers be (properly) their Fountaines, yet here are they to be vnderſtood, to be ſpoken of the beginning of their diuiſion from the firſt ſtreame. Caput aquæ (ſaith VLPIANVS) illud eſt, vnde aqua naſcitur; ſi ex fonte naſcatur, fons, ſi ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountaine, then is the Fountaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuer any branch be ſeparate and diuided, then where that branch doth firſt bound it ſelfe with new bankes, there is that part of the Riuer, where the branch forſaketh the maine ſtreame, called the head of the Riuer.

§. XII.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

IT may also bee demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs described, bee of such fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the seate of Paradise was: which if it be denyed, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulnesse to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the floud; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Ninive, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Vrbs Ninus sita erat. Hac regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and he addeth afterward: Cereris autem fructu procreando adeò ferax est, vt nunquàm non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaues of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are euen in length like vnto Trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbeare to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulnesse, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Country of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Country Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig Trees. Thus farre Herodotus.

Herod. Clia. li. 1.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Brad, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fift commoditie, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kind of fine Flaxe, of which people make their Garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That he receiued a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yeeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) passim per omnem Regionem Palmæ sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus à parte læua Arabiæ odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam vbere & pingui solo, vt à pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plentie of sweet Odours) there lyeth a Champaine Country placed betweene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitfull and fat a soile, that they are said to driue their Cattell from pasture, lest they should perish by satietie. Bis in anno segetes Babylony secant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a yeare (saith Niger.) And as Countreyes generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, then in the Northerne parts: so we may iudge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemq; semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, & Trees alwayes greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life & stirrer vp of Nature in a perpetuall actiuitie. In briefe, so great is the fertilitie of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to eate them vp with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fortie yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare Seed, but it grew vp as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (ſaith Plinie) who addeth this ſingularitie to that ſoile, That the ſecond yeere the very ſtubble (or rather falling downe of the ſeedes againe) yeeldeth them a Haruеſt of Corne without any further labour: his words are theſe: Vbertatis tanta ſunt, vt ſequenti anno ſponte reſtibilis fiat ſeges. Plin. Nat. hiſt. l. 18. c. 17.

§. XIII.

Of the Riuer Piſon, and the Land of Hauilah.

AFter the diſcouerie of Eden, and the teſtimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it reſteth to proue that Piſon and Gehon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certainetie of theſe two Riuers ſhould trouble ſo many wiſe men it is ſtrange to me, ſeeing neceſſitie it ſelfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both, be that Riuer or Riuers of Eden, which water Paradiſe, which Riuer or Riuers Moſes witneſſeth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Piſon, the other Gehon, &c. Could there bee a ſtranger fancie in the world, then when we finde both theſe (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Aſſyria and Meſopotamia, to ſeeke the other two in India and Ægypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Riuers as farre diſtant, as any of fame knowne or diſcouered in the world: the Scriptures making it ſo plaine, that theſe Riuers were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reaſon and Experience bearing witneſſe. There is no errour, which hath not ſome ſlipperie and bad foundation, or ſome apparance of probabilitie, reſembling truth, which when men (who ſtudie to bee ſingular) finde out, (ſtraining reaſon according to their fancies) they then publiſh to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find ſome partakers or ſectators, the better by their helpe to nurſe and cheriſh ſuch weake babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this miſtaking (and firſt for the Riuer of Piſon) ſeemeth to haue growne out of the not-diſtinguiſhing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Suſiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris tooke name from Hauilah the ſonne of Cuſh, and Hauilah in India, from Hauilah the ſonne of Ioctan, the one remembred by Moſes in the deſcription of Paradiſe the other where Moſes ſetteth downe the generations of Noah, and his ſonnes after the floud. For the ſonnes of Cuſh were Seba, Hauilah, Sabtah, and Raamah, and the ſonnes of Ioctan were Ophir, and Hauilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the ſonnes of Ioctan, that Iland of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning had their names. Now becauſe Ganges is a great and a famous Riuer of the Eaſt India, and Hauilah a Countrie of the ſame, and is ſituated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Piſon, which Riuer is ſaid by Moſes to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was ſuppoſed that thoſe foure Riuers, named by Moſes, muſt of neceſſitie be foure of the greateſt in the world; whence (ſuppoſing that Ganges was the next great and famous Riuer after Tigris and Euphrates) they chooſe out this Riuer to make one of the foure. And yet certainely there is another Riuer, whom in theſe reſpects they ſhould rather haue choſen then Ganges; for the Riuer Indus on this ſide India, for beautie, for neerenеſſe, & for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reaſonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, ſeeing Indus commeth betweene it and Tigris? and betweene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Perſia, conſiſting of many Kingdomes. And againe, further towards the Eaſt, and beyond Indus, are all thoſe ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betweene thoſe two proud Riuers of Indus and Ganges now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, becauſe it is remoued from Tigris by all the breadth of Perſia, then how much leſſe Ganges; which falleth into the Ocean, little leſſe then fortie degrees to the Eaſtward of Indus? Surely, whoſoeuer readeth the Storie of Alexander, ſhall finde, that there is no Riuer in Aſia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaſpis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies tranſported himſelfe, and the greateſt part of his armie, and in ſayling downe that branch of Indus, found it ſo large, and deepe, and by reaſon thereof ſo great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleete, which was ready to bee ſwallowed vp therein: Hydaſpis (as afore ſaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great great as it, hauing beſides this, the Riuers of Coas, of Suaſtus, Aceſines, Adris (otherwiſe Hirotis, Hiſpalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are ſwallowed vp with all their Children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one ſtreame, it croſſeth athwart Aſia, and then at Cambaia viſiteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen.2.15. But becauſe Piſon, which compaſſeth Hauilah, as alſo Gehon, which watereth Cuſh, muſt ſome-where be ioyned with the reſt in one bodie; or at leaſt be found to proceede out of the ſame Countrie of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede, out of doubt they cannot eyther the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riſeth in the vttermoſt of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the Riuer Ganges riſeth out of the Mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Caucaſus, which diuides the Northerne Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the ſame Armenia, by the Gordiæan Mountaines, ſo as Ganges, who onely trauaileth in her owne India, and Nilus through Æthiopia and Ægypt, neuer ſaw the land of Eden, or ioyned themſelues in one channell, either with themſelues, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be ſeparated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Moſes.

Gen.2.v.12. Therefore the Riuer Piſon, which enricheth Hauilah, is the ſame which by ioyning it ſelfe with Tigris, was therefore called Piſi-tigris, or Piſo-tigris, of Piſon and Tigris, which Riuer watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the Sonne of Cuſh gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, ſo called of Hauilah the Sonne of Ioctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the Eaſt. And this Hauilah of the Cuſhites had alſo Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx ſtone. This Bdellium is a Tree, of the bigneſſe of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine gum ſweet to ſmell to, but bitter in taſte, called alſo Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-ſtone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew ſignifieth Pearle: ſo doth Eugubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaſter: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Hauilah or Suſiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrie of Suſiana or Hauilah ſtretcheth it ſelfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as farre as the Perſian Gulfe, on the Eaſt ſide thereof: from which Eaſt ſide had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo alſo witneſſeth, as was ſhewed before.

Steuch. Hopk. de Par. The Greekes had a conceit, that Piſon was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (ſayth Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, tranſlateth Piſon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the ſame impoſſibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Helleſpont and all Aſia the leſſe, betweene it and Tigris. Now Piſon, which runneth through Hauilah or Suſiana, doth to this day retaine ſome ſigne of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioynt and compounded name, and are called Piſo-tigris. And it is ſtrange vnto me, that from ſo great antiquitie there ſhould be found remaining any reſembling ſound of the firſt name: for Babylon it ſelfe, which dwelleth ſo neere theſe Riuers, is by ſome writers knowne by the name of Bandas, as, by Poſtellus, by Caſtaldus, of Baldach: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by Andrew Theuet; and yet all thoſe that haue lately ſeene it, call it Bagdet. To this Riuer of Piſon, Ptolomie indeede with many others giue the name of Baſilius or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mahar-ſares and Marſias, and Baarſares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and Fountaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Iunius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profuſion, or comming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrewes Parath, (ſayth Ar. Montanus:) Pagninus, Perath: Ioſephus, Phorah; Euſebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Giſtilanus, and Colinutius terme it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Aſſyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

Poſt. Coſmog. Theuet. Coſmog. Aſia tab.4.

Plin.lib.5. c.24.

The ſame confuſion of names hath Tigris, as Diglito, and Diglath, Scilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Geneſis conceiueth rightly of theſe Riuers: for Euphrates and Tigris (ſaith he) ſtreame into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other

other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason, why these two riuers ioyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Pisi-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldæa not farre from Vr, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pison doth.

This errour that Pison was Ganges, was first broched by Iosephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weedes) and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence (were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India, to find out Hauilah: so was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compasse Æthiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adioining to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsly interpreted Æthiopia) fastened to it on the other side, wee shall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impose vpon men the transportation of Riuers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cush the Sonne of Ham first sate downe with his sonnes Shebah, Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the sonne of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cush himselfe. For as the sonnes of Ioctan, Ophir and Hauilah, seated themselues as neere together as they could in India, so did the sonnes of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chauilah was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana,

From this Hauilah vnto the Deserts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalechites possesse all the interiacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalechites from Hauilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphrast conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the Red Sea, to Hauilah in the East India, for Saul was no such trauailer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah must be found neerer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which countrie Saul wasted: for Amalec & the Amalechites possest that necke of Countrie, betweene the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leauing that great body of Arabia fœlix towards the South, and they spred themselues with the Midianites and Edumæans, from the East part, or backe side of the Holie Land, to the bankes of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petræa and Deserta. 1. Sam. 15. 7.

§. XIIII.

Of the Riuer Gehon and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Æthiopia for Cush, 2. CHRON. 21. 16.

NOw, as Hauilah in the East India drew Pison so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seuentie translated Æthiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Æthiopia by the Greekes whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Æthiopians are, as much, as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countrie is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Ægypt. And although there bee many other Regions of Æthiopians, and farre South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Ægyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Ægypt: all which Æthiopians are very neere, or else directly vnder the Equinoctiall line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner. There are (saith he) two Æthiopia's, the East, and the West: and this diuision he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Æthiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to bee the East Æthiopia. See more of this point, c. 7. §. 10.

Now if it be granted, that Cush and the land of the Chusites, be that tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitauit ISMAEL ab Hauilah vsq. Sur, quæ respicit Ægyptum Gen. 25. 18.

Ægyptum introeuntibus Assyrios; ISMAEL dwelt from Hauilah vnto Sur, that is, towards Ægypt, as thou goest toward Assyria; The same sufficeth to proue that Gehon cannot bee Nilus, but a Riuer which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitauit ISMAEL, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Hauilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Countrey bordering Assyria; and Sur, Vers.16. which lyeth toward Ægypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions betweene the border of Ægypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplyed, it well appeared,
2.Chron.14.9. when Zearah the Chusite, which others call Tharantha, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; for that had beene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Ægypt, betweene Palæstina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, hee in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zearah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Æthiopians, it cannot bee suspected: for these bee the wordes of the Scripture disprouing it: And
Gen.10.v.11. ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt betweene Cadesh and Exod.17.8. Sur, and soiourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feete after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had beene wearie, and vnable to resist. Againe, in the Gen.26.1. storie of Isaac it is written: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistims vnto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistims were no Æthiopians.
10.19. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where hee describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou commest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeed, howsoeuer Pererius doth with an honest excuse sálue his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainely, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his fift Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Prester Iohn; And the West Æthiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Niger, which wee call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perorsi, Daratites, with diuers other Plin.l.5.c.8. names, which Plinie numbreth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prester Iohn, and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus vvas exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, vvhich hee hath of Moses vvhen hee serued Pharao, in the warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet HIEREMIE;
c.2.v.18. And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, vt bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith PERERIVS, profecto Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, quæ significat nigrum & turbidum; Truely (saith PERERIVS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth blacke and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken Exod.2.21.3.1. for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Iethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom Num.12.1. both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopissam, as (with Iosephus) the Geneua conuerts it, though it helpe it a little with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of

Arabia

Arabia Petraa, bordering the Red Sea, for it is written in the ſecond of Exodus, that MOSES fled from PHARAO into the Land of Madian, and ſate downe by a Well, &c. and a- Verſ.15.
gaine, in the third of Exodus; When MOSES kept the ſheepe of IETHRO his father in law, Verſ.1.
Prieſt of Madian, &c. Indeede, theſe foure nations are euery where mixt in the Scriptures, becauſe they dwell confuſedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Iſmaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chuſites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures ſometimes called by one of thoſe names, and ſometimes by another, as in Gen.37.v.25.27.&28. that Ioſeph was ſold to the Iſmaelites; and in the ſame Chapter, v.36. it is written, that the Madianites ſold Ioſeph to Putiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Geneuians, in a marginall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) ſay, that Moſes wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Iſmaelites to be all one. But Moſes wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and theſe were all Arabians, & ſo in this very place it appeareth by their merchandiſe, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioſeph: for their Camels were loden with Spicery and Gen.37.25.
Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia fœlix: from whence chiefly, and from the Eaſt India, all the World is ſerued with Myrrhe and Frankincenſe; and their Spices they receiued from the Eaſt ſide of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforeſaid. And in the 39. Chap. it is ſaid: That Putiphar bought Ioſeph of the Iſmaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphraſt in the ſame place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifeſt, it is Verſ.1.
written in the ſixt of Iudges, That when Iſrael had ſowen, then came vp the Madianites, Verſ.3.
and the Amalekites, and they of the Eaſt, and came vpon them: they of the Eaſt, were Arabians of the Deſart; ſo as where before in the buying of Ioſeph, the Madianites and the Iſmaelites were confuſed, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the proſecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites onely are named, as com- Cap.7.
prehending both Nations; and in the eight Chapter, v.24. theſe Nations are all called Iſmaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon deſired, that euery man would giue him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory againſt Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. ſhickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare-rings, becauſe they were Iſmaelites. And theſe Iſma- c.8.v.24.

omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (ſaith God of ISMAEL) ſhall be againſt all men, and euery mans hand againſt him. Of theſe Iſmaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though ſome Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schenita. And theſe Iſmaelites, which inhabite chiefly in Cedar, and the Deſarts of Sur and Pharan (ſaith Ioſephus) vſe poyſon vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-eaſt are the Madianites, and Chuſites: and beyond them, towards the Deſarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Laſtly, the ill tranſlation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made moſt apparant, in the ſecond of Chronicles, in theſe words: So the Lord ſtirred vp againſt IEHORAM, the ſpirit of the Philiſtines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; ſo Hierom reades it: the Geneua tranſlation hath it, which were beſides the Æthiopians. Now, how far it is off betweene the Philiſtines, and the Negro's, or the Æthiopians, euery man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philiſtines and Arabians doe mixe & ioyne with the Land of the Chuſites, and are diſtant from Æthiopia about two and thirtie, or three & thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours, but all Egypt, and the Deſarts of Sur and Pharan, are betweene them. So as this place of the ſecond of Chronicles, ſhould haue beene tranſlated in theſe words: So the Lord ſtirred vp againſt IEHORAM, the ſpirits of the Philiſtines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chuſites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla ſupereſt dubitatio quin Æthiopia in Sacris literis ſit Arabiæ propinqua; There remayneth no doubt (ſaith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ioyneth to Arabia. * Steuch. Eugub. in Gen.c.2.

Now may we thinke is it probable, or poſſible, that Moſes could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no liuing man ſo well, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon. Surely, if Moſes had meant Nilus, when hee named Gehon, he would haue called the Riuer (into which he was caſt vpon Reeds, and preſerued by God, working compaſſion in the Daughter of Pharao) a Riuer of Egypt, where- Exod.2.
in he was borne & bred, & wrought ſo many miracles. Beſides, the Riuer of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moſes had told the Israelites, that Nilus had beene a Riuer of Paradise, they might iustly haue thought, that he had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall beleeue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Oliues in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Esay, & once in the Prophet Hieremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a Riuer of Æthiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Æthiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often gouerned by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cœlesyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselues, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Hierusalem it selfe was with-held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

Plin. l. 5. c. 1. c. 23. v. 3. c. 2. v. 18.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Beroaldus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Riuers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Riuers he also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges; nor Gehon, Nilus, so where to find them else-where it seemeth he knew not. Certainely this Riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betweene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more then twenty English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, & neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Floud, Chus and his Children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited. Hauilah tooke the Riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Hauilah, (now Susiana:) Raamah, and Sheba farther downe the Riuer, in the entrance of Arabia fœlix. NIMROD seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother Mizraim first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldæa, and in processe of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselues more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past ouer into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such Riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Æthiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if wee doe examine this mistaking by example, wee shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that Brute, or whosoeuer else that first peopled this Iland, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and calling the Iland after his name Britannia, it might bee said that Thames or Tems was a Riuer that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in processe of time, the same Brute had also discouered and conquered Scotland, which hee also intituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the Riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discouerers thereof arriued in the mouth of some Riuer in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as hee first discouered, shall wee in like sort resolue that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them? in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chuſites ſhould or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabite, ſeeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue beene Maſters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the ſonne of Chus, conſiſted at the firſt but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his Succeſſours within a few yeares after commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel conſumed the memorie of Chuſea. For of this Tower of Confuſion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatneſſe of that Empire founded by Nimrod a yonger ſonne, obſcured the name and nation of his father Cuſh in thoſe parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chuſites retayned their names, which alſo they faſtned to the Soile and Territorie by themſelues afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haſte creepe through thoſe deſart Regions, which the length of 130. yeares after the Floud had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted euery Buſh and Bryar, Reede and Tree to ioyne themſelues (as it were) into one mayne body and Forreſt. For if we looke with iudgement and reaſon into the Worlds plantation, we ſhall find, that euery Family ſeated themſelues as neare together as poſſible they could, and though neceſſitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to ſpread themſelues, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times reſort, and ſuccour one another by Riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impaſſable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and ſtrength vſurped dominion ouer the reſt, ſate downe in the very confluence of all thoſe Riuers, which watered Paradiſe: for thither it was to which the greateſt troupes of Noahs children repayred; and from the ſame place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increaſe. The firſt Father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The ſecond Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his diſperſion.

Now as Nimrod the yongeſt, yet ſtrongeſt, made his choice of Babel (as aforeſaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleanſed and enriched; ſo did Hauilah place himſelfe vpon Piſo-Tigris: Raamah and his ſonne Sheba farther downe vpon the ſame Riuer, on the Sea-coaſt of Arabia: Chus himſelfe vpon Gehon, the faireſt branch of Euphrates. And when they began to ſpread themſelues farther off, yet they alwayes faſtened themſelues to the Riuers ſides: for Ninive, Charran, Reſeph, Canneh, Vr in Chaldæa, and the other firſt-peopled Cities were all founded vpon theſe nauigable Riuers, or their branches, by which the one might giue ſuccour and aſſiſtance to the other, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A concluſion by way of repetition of ſomething ſpoken of before.

BVt now to conclude this diſpute, it appeareth to me by the teſtimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradiſe was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, ſeated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluuiorum, or Meſopotamia, which taketh into it alſo a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region ſtanding in the moſt excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Æquinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the moſt excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all ſorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this ſaid ſoile and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein ſoeuer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can moſt vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet ſhall this Plant be the greateſt wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giueth vnto man whatſoeuer his life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may be ſaid, that theſe Trees are found both in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, which Countries are alſo bleſſed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by thoſe pleaſures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diſeaſes, the multitude of venimous Beaſts and Wormes, with other inconueniences, and then there will bee found no compariſon betweene the one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) curſed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may ſafely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workemanſhip of God, by ſo much did that choſen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Vniuerſall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants onely proper, and becomming the Paradiſe, and Garden of ſo great a Lord.

The ſumme of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-ſighted (ſome of them finding Paradiſe beyond our knowne World: ſome, aboue the middle Region of the Ayre: ſome, eleuated neere the Moone: others as farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be ſufficiently ſatisfied, that theſe were but like Caſtles in the Ayre, and in mens fancies, vainely imagined. For it was Eaſtward in Eden (ſaith Moſes) Eaſtward, in reſpect of Iudæa, that God planted this Garden, which Eden wee finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in ſome part) remaineth to this day. A Riuer went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it ſelfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates ſwimming through Eden, doe ioyne in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah according to Moſes: the true ſeates of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Piſon was Ganges, the Scripture, Reaſon, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was neuer ioyned, cannot be diuided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Riuers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the ſame diſtance maketh the ſame impoſſibilitie, and this Riuer is a greater ſtranger to Tigris & Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are betwenne Tigris and Ganges aboue foure thouſand miles, yet they both riſe in the ſame quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almoſt as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates diſtilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Perſia: the one riſeth in the South, and trauaileth North: the other riſeth in the North, and runneth South, three ſcore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographicall deſcription of this terreſtriall Paradiſe, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Diſcourſe; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receiue an allowance ſuſpended, vntill ſuch time as this deſcription of mine be reproued by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradiſe.

§. I.

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what ſenſe it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made ſubiect to death.

FOr eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driuen out of Paradiſe, in exilium vitæ temporalis, into the baniſhment of temporall life, ſaith Beda. That theſe Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Goſpell) it is not doubted by the moſt religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are ſo volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and ſo ſlipperie, as nothing can faſten them, haue in this alſo deliuered to the World, an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (ſay the Hebrewes) hath a plurall conſtruction, and is to be vnderſtood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of liues, becauſe the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preſerue both the growing, ſenſitiue, and rationall life of man; and not onely (but for Adams tranſgreſſion) had prolonged his owne dayes, but alſo giuen a durefull continuance to all poſteritie; and that, ſo long, as a body compounded of Elements could laſt.

BIBL. CANT. ACAD.

Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyed thereby a long, healthfull, and vngrieued life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) he should haue beene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Floud, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres; and soone after the floud, of two hundred yeeres and vpwards, euen to fiue hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceiued. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beleefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had beene immortall. But such is the infinite Wisedome of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not haue contained Mankind; or else, that millions of soules must haue beene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue beene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue conceiued, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisedome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouercommeth, to eate of the Tree of Life, which is in the Paradise of God. Apocal. 2. 7. But to this place Saint Augustines answere may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth euery Tree faire to the sight, and sweete to taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, steale the inuention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to bee the meate and drinke of the gods.

§. II.

Of BECANVS his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOw for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed further, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euer ghesse at, whereat Goropius much marualleth. But as hee had an inuentiue braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleeued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, how soeuer his opinion may be valued, yet hee vsurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the inuention bee at that price at which hee setteth it. For Moses Bar-cephas fastened on this coniecture aboue sixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Bar-cephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Mabugensis, and others, whose very words Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith hee would induce other men to that beleefe. For Moses Bar-cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-Tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the bankes of Acesines, one of the Riuers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleete of Gallies in, or neere the Kingdome of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree, Se semper serens; Alwaies planting it selfe; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroade, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselues vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downewards, & leaues no lesse then a shield. Plin. l. 11. c. 5. Lib. 1. cap. 2.

Aristobulus

Aristobulus affirmeth, that fiftie Horsemen may shadow themselues vnder one of these Trees. Onesicritus rayseth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinie and Onesicritus confirme: to the trunke of which, these Authors giue such a magnitude, as I shame to repeate. But it may bee, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiueth, who because hee found it no where else, would needes draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the Riuer Aceſines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue seene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot vp some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunke or stemme: for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy iuyce, which hangeth downeward like a cord or sinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vtmost boughes of these yong Trees there fall againe the like cords, which in one yeare and lesse (in that World of a perpetuall Spring) become also trees of the bighnesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight, as arte or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees considered with all his yong ones, may (indeed) shrowd foure hundred or foure thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downeward to finde roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breede, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue seene fiue hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauailed a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith hee) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill is described to bee.

Secondly, this Tree hauing so huge a trunke (as the former Authors report, and Becanus beleeueth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eue hid themselues from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could contayne them. But first it is certayne, that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude, as touching the trunke or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger then the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters vnderstood in the plurall number (that is) in the middest of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Barcephas, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eue found themselues naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being possest with shame, did not run vp and downe the Garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse, which Plinie auoweth in these words: Latitudo foliorum pelta effigiem Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Virg. Aen. l. 1. 494.

Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis
PENTHESILEA furens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILEA leades into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to bee beleeued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to this his borrowed discouerie, vsing this confident (or rather cholericke) speech: Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si haec à nobis de ficu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum MOSIS narratione comparet, vt audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri posse, quae cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we

we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers deliuered, with the narration of MOSES, as to dare to auow, that any other Tree can bee found, which doth more properly anſwer, or agree therewith? But for my ſelfe, becauſe I neither find this Tree, ſorting in body, in largeneſſe of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of theſe trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: onely thereby, and by the eaſie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbeare to feede thereon, it pleaſed God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quàm ad commendandum puræ ac ſimplicis Obedientia bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other reſpect, then thereby to commend the goodneſſe of pure and ſimple Obedience. Auguſt. de Ciuit. Dei, l. 13. c. 20.

§. III.

Of BECANVS his not vnwitty allegorizing of the ſtory of his Ficus Indica.

BVt in this I muſt doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his ſuppoſition of the Tree it ſelfe to bee true. The effects whereof, becauſe his diſcourſes are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in theſe few words. As this Tree (ſaith he) ſo did Man grow ſtraight and vpright towards God, vntill ſuch time as he had tranſgreſſed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downeward, and ſtooped toward the earth, which all the reſt of Adams poſteritie after him haue done, rooting themſelues therein, and faſtning themſelues to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbragiouſneſſe of this tree, he compareth to the darke and ſhadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iuſtice being not able to pierce, wee haue all remayned in the ſhaddow of death, till it pleaſed Chriſt to climbe the tree of the Croſſe for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among ſo many large leaues, may be compared (ſaith hee) to the little vertue, and vnperceiued knowledge among ſo large vanities, which obſcure and ſhadow it ouer. And as this fruit is exceeding ſweet, and delicate to the taſte and palate: ſo are the delights and pleaſures of the world moſt pleaſing, while they dure. But as all thoſe things which are moſt melliſluous, are ſooneſt changed into choller and bitterneſſe: ſo are our vanities and pleaſures conuerted into the bittereſt ſorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are ſo exceeding large, the fruit (for ſuch leaues) exceeding little, in this, by compariſon we behold (ſaith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their ſollicitude, their outward ſhewes, and publike oſtentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we ſeeke for the fruit, which ought to bee their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bigneſſe of the ſmalleſt peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodneſſe, to all the world inuiſible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and boughes of this Tree, by ſo much exceed all other Plants, as the greateſt men of power and worldly abilitie ſurpaſſe the meaneſt: ſo is the little fruit of ſuch men, and ſuch trees, rather fitting and becomming the vnworthyeſt Shrub, and humbleſt Bryar, or the pooreſt and baſeſt Man, than ſuch a flouriſhing ſtatelineſſe, and magnitude. Laſtly, whereas Adam, after hee had diſobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakedneſſe and ſhame, ſought for leaues to couer himſelfe withall, this may ſerue to put vs in minde of his and our ſinnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintayne which, wee vſe ſo many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with ſome other notes touching the ſtorie of ADAMS ſinne.

NOw, as touching the ſenſe of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it ſelfe, Moſes Bar-cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (tranſlated by Maſius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no ſuch vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if hee had beene ignorant before; but as Iunius also noteth: Arbor scientiæ boni & mali (id est) experientiæ boni & mali ab euentu; The Tree of Knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men liuing, haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortalitie from the breath or spirit of God, he could not (for these respects) bee ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods Commandement was the fearefullest euill, and the obseruation of his Precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health doe (notwithstanding) conceiue, that sicknesse is grieuous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselues they afterwards witnesse: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proofe thereof in himselfe another terror then he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euill, which could not be expresst. He then saw himselfe naked both in body and mind; that is, depriued of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are giuen to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, by cause of the euent (as is aforesaid:) so was the

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge then he had perceiued in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glorie which he might obtayne by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleasing perswasions, vnawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Satan, who laboured to poyson mankinde in the very roote, which he moystned with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

Bart.sem.2.l.2. But what meanes did the Deuill find out, or what instruments did his owne subtlety present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischiefe by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; so as by Adams harkning to the voice of his wife, contrary to the expresse commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subiect of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a Comforter and Gen.3.17. Companion, but not for a Counseller. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (said God himselfe:) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the most vgly and vnworthy of all beasts, into whom the Deuill entred and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the motiue of her disobedience? euen a desire to know what was most vnfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath euer since remayned in all the posteritie of her sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her perswasions? euen the same cause which hath moued all men since to the like consent, namely, an vnwillingnesse to grieue her and make her sad, lest shee should pine and be ouer-come with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of Dauid, Gods chosen seruant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisedome, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the loue they bare to a Woman; it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages haue beene allured to so many inconuenient and wicked practices, by the perswasions of their wiues, or other beloued Darlings, who couer ouer and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and vnquietnesse.

§. I.

Of the cause and the reuenge of CAINS sinne: and of his going out from God.

THE same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possest Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (enuious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slue him, making himselfe the first Manslayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnaturall Murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cryed out that his punishment was greater then he could beare. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and prouoked God) hee destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giueth a reason, for saith he, The Earth was filled with crueltie: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne vnto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with crueltie thorough them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this crueltie meant to haue beene in taking away the liues of men only, but in all sorts of Iniustice and Oppression. After this Murther of ABEL, CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be vnderstood after the literall sense; God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in cœlo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed vtrumq; simul; God (saith Saint AVGVSTINE) is wholly in Heauen, and wholly in Earth, not by enterchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, Dauid witnesseth: If I be in Heauen (saith DAVID) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exijt à facie Dei (saith CHRYSOSTOME) CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfauoured and bereaued of his protection.

§. II.

Of CAINS dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

THis word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandring or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Iunius; but the Sequentie conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, then any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther commited, iustly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And whosoeuer findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherin Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and wee call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a Citie, and called it by the name of his first-borne, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Iewes; and that as Cain after that he had slaine Abel vniustly, had thence-forth no certaine abiding in the World: so the Iewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer since any certaine Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne vpon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soeuer, which in old time liued by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) vpon white meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes, Nomades, and by the Latines, Pastores vagi; as the Northerne Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Brittans, and the Northerne Irish: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italie it selfe, till such time as Italus (who gaue them that name) taught them the Husbandry of tillage, vsed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolemie, Calena, which also might be deriued of Carena, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, GEN. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence hee was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus hee cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubins: which sheweth that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text, Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitiue, we can giue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Cain, then till he built the Citie of Enoch, the first of the World, which hee inclosed either for his owne defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppresse others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am resolued with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain vseth of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as trauaileth in feare of reuengement: for whosoeuer findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.

Verse 23. 24.

And because these Henochians, so called of the Citie Henoch, were the first societie and ciuill assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these people (either for crueltie, strength, or other actions) liued in the memorie of Noah and his Sonnes; so that after the Floud (as there were of all sorts of natures, some vertuously, some impiously disposed, and euery actiue minde setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in crueltie and oppression tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Henoch stood before the Floud, and whereof the Monuments might remayne (as the Pillars or the foundation of Ioppe did) gaue occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselues by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the same name many Mountaines, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath couered ouer or defaced, we may (according to the counsell of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therewith satisfie our selues, if of so great and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & Nations there remain any print or foot-steps to Posterity.

Quotidiè aliquid in hoc magno orbe mutatur, noua vrbium fundamẽta iaciuntur, noua Gentium nomina (extinctis nominibus prioribus) oriuntur, Seneca ad Albinum.

In * Plinie, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, wee finde those Henochei described, though diuersly written, as in Plinie, sometimes Heniochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus Heniochi, in Lucan Enochij, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the Eastside of Eden, or (according to Moses wordes) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he vseth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleuenth hee writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

V. 2.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations tooke name of Henoch the Citie of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repeopled after the Floud: so it is probable that these Henochij of Colchis, & other parts adioyning, were not the first of that name, after the Sonnes of Noah began to fill the World againe: because, had this Henoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Plinie findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards hee goeth on Eastward, till hee tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For hee calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolomie Zani; beyond which

an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these he againe discouereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest tooke beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the Mountaines of Ra-pani ſus, betweene them and the great Riuer of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochij are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it selfe.

And although wee cannot bee assured, that these Henochij tooke name from the memorie of the Citie of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spred themselues Westward (as all Noahs Sonnes did that came into Shinar) the coniecture is farre more probable, then that of Annius the Frier, who sets Henoch in Phœnicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phœnicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these seuerall Nations of the Henochij, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the same name. Onely the Gracians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things else) out of the word (Henıochi) which signifieth Carts or Coach-men; make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprize of Iason into Colchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Iason with other Greekes ranged the Coasts of Asia the lesse in an open Boat, or kind of small Galley,* of whom I shall speake in his owne time: yet no man doubteth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poeticall; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their owne Rowers, being 54. there was no place, and lesse vse of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

BVt of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Citie of Henoch in prophane Storie, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answere some few Obiections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (hauing no other assistance then his Sonne Henoch) to performe such a Worke as the building of a Citie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses vseth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Storie of the first Race, which wasted by the least account, 1656. yeares, in fiue short Chapters. Yet thus much may euery man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first Generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and meanes to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacitie answering to what other of the World soeuer: for in what Age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his Issues Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that he built a City: so was it said of Noah, that his three Sonnes peopled all the World; but in both, the processe of time required to be vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vseth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos or à fine dierum (that is) in processe of time, it came to passe that CAIN brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to bee vnderstood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased, he built the Citie of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee built the Temple of Hierusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon, that he employed in that Worke, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selues to say, The King inuaded; when he caused an inuasion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a building. And therfore seeing we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains Issues, it is not to be marualled at, why he also passeth ouer in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for Gen.4.17. of Cain, Moses, writeth in this manner: CAIN also knew his Wife, who conceiued and bare HENOCH, and he built a Citie, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his sonne HENOCH. And to HENOCH was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHVIAEL, and

18. MEHVIAEL begat METHVSAEL, and METHVSAEL LAMECH.

C.5.v.5. Now of Seth, Moses writeth farre otherwise, and in this manner. And SETH lined an hundred and fiue yeares, and begat ENOCH, and SETH liued after he begat ENOCH 807. yeare, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: so as all the dayes of SETH were 912. yeares, and he dyed: as for the yeares & times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro viuentium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing ouer the Reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

2	Cain.	7	Lamech, who by Ada had	2	Seth.	7	Henoch.
3	Henoch.	8	Iubal and Tubal, & by Silla Tubalcain, and Noëma.	3	Enosh.	8	Mathusalem.
4	Irad.			4	Cainan:	9	Lamech, and
5	Mahuiael.			5	Mahaleel.	10	Noah.
6	Mathusael.			6	Iarad.

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Iosephus giueth vnto Lamech threescore and seuenteene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wiues Ada and Silla: and to these three Sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the Inuention of Pastorage, of Musicke, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Iubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vntamed, and Gen.4.20.21,22 brought them into Heards and Droues. Tubal inuented Musicke, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to Idlenesse and Pleasure. In whom beganne these three meaner degrees of Sheepheards, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Seruices of God, Diuinitie, Prophecie, and Astronomie: the Children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second scruple hath beene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their Children at so diuers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seuentie yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threescore and fiue yeares, whereas Iared begat not any of his vntill he was 162. yeares old: Mathusalem begat at a 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot bee coniectured, that either Iared, Mathusalem or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threescore and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Floud precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Iarad, nor Lamech the first-borne of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but that Noah might haue had many Sonnes before Shem, Ham and Iaphet, though these three were only named, and surviuing, and which by God were reserued to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Floud; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to bee begotten by Kenan at threescore and ten yeares who was the first Sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187. yeare of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reckoneth all the other sonnes of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because hee was the Father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this

Saint

Saint Auguſtine hath ſomewhat elſe in his twentieth and one and twentieth Chapters, De Ciuitate Dei.

But as Moſes counted the Generations of the firſt Age, & ſo to Abraham, and the children of the Promiſe after him, ſo doth Saint Matthew recite the Genealogie of Chriſt, not by the eldeſt ſonnes, but from thoſe whom God had choſen and bleſſed, without reſpect of the firſt-borne, who haue hereby the prerogatiue in Eſtates, worldly and tranſitorie only; and therefore the Euangeliſt nameth Iſaac, and not Iſmael, though Iſmael were firſt in time: ſo doth he take Iacob the younger, and not Eſau the elder; neither is Chriſt deriued from any of the three eldeſt Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Leui, but from Iuda a fourth Brother, and ſo from Dauid a younger ſonne of Ieſſai; and laſtly, wee find, that the Kingdome it ſelfe of Iuda was not giuen to the Heire in Nature, but to the Heire of Grace, namely Salomon. Mat.1.2. 1.Kings 2.

§. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and ſome of late memorie.

THe third Obiection is, that the great difference of yeares betweene thoſe of the firſt Age, whereof ſome of them had well-neere ſeene a thouſand yeares, makes it diſputable, whether the account of times were of the ſame meaſure as in after-Ages, ſeeing, that ſoone after the Floud, men liued not a third part of that time, and in ſucceeding Ages and to this day, not the tenth.

They that haue hereon reſolued that thoſe yeares were but Lunarie yeares, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are eaſily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enoſh in the yeare of his life an hundred and fiue, if thoſe yeares bee taken but for Moneths, then had Seth liued but eight yeares, and one Moneth when hee begat Enoſh: & if the time of Enoſh haue the ſame allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enoſh at that time haue beene but ſixe yeares and fortie eight weekes old; and ſo it may bee gathered of the reſt excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and ſeed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an abilitie of Generation at ſix, ſeuen or eight yeares, agreeth with the ſhort liues of the Pigmies, and not with the conſtitutions of our firſt Fathers, who being deſcended from Adam, the workmanſhip of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the ſtrong youth of the Word, had length of dayes and abilitie of body agreeable. Againe, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunarie yeares, then there would follow this extremitie, that thoſe which liued longeſt, and vpwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of foureſcore and ten and odde yeares; which were not only leſſe by farre then the Patriarchs liued after the Floud, but ſhort of many mens liues in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed foureſcore, & ſome a hundred yeares. Further (if need be) to diſproue this reckoning, whereas it is written, *Gen.*25. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeares) makes but ſeuenteene and an halfe of our yeares. Solin. Pol. hiſt. c.3 Macrob. Satur. lib.1. cap.8. Plin. l.7. c.48.

And if we ſeeke for a cauſe of this long life in Nature, then is it reaſonable, that the firſt man, created in higheſt perfection, ſhould alſo beget Children of equall ſtrength or little differing: for of the firſt and pureſt ſeed there muſt of neceſſitie ſpring vp the faireſt and fruitfulleſt Plants. Secondly, the Earth it ſelfe was then much leſſe corrupt, which yeelded her increaſe, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any ſuch mixture of harmefull qualitie, as ſince that time the Curſe of God for the crueltie of mans heart brought on it and Mankind: Neither had the Waters of the Floud infuſed ſuch an impuritie, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits vpon the Earth receiued a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of ſtrength, and another of weakneſſe, a youth & beautie, and then age and deformitie: ſo Time it ſelfe (vnder the deathfull ſhade of whoſe wings all things decay and wither) hath waſted and worne out that liuely vertue of Nature in Man, and Beaſts, and Plants; yea, the Heauens themſelues being of a moſt pure and cleanſed matter, ſhall waxe old as a Garment; and then much more the power generatiue in inferiour Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receiue operatiue Vertue from the ſuperiour. Pſal.102. v.26.

But beſides the olde age of the World, how farre doth our education and ſimplitie of liuing differ from that old time? the tender bringing vp of Children, firſt fedde and nouriſhed with the Milke of a ſtrange Dugge; an vnnaturall curioſitie hauing taught all Women (but the Begger) to find out Nurſes, which neceſſitie only ought to commend vnto them: The haſtie Marriages in tender yeares, wherein, Nature being but yet greene and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her ſelfe hath not yet any root ſufficient to maintaine her owne top; and ſuch halfe-ripe Seeds (for the moſt part) in their growing vp wither in the bud, and wax old euen in their Infancie. But aboue all things the exceeding luxurioufneſſe of this gluttonous Age, wherein wee preſſe Nature with ouer-weightie burdens, and finding her ſtrength defectiue, wee take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of ſtrong Waters, hot Spices, and prouoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath theſe elegant Verſes:

Pharſal. 4.

O prodigа rerum	Diſcite quàm paruo liceat producere vitam:
Luxuries, nunquam paruo contenta paratu:	Et quantum Natura petat.
Et quæſitorum terra pelagoq; ciborum	Non auro myrrhâq; bibunt: ſed gurgite puro
Ambitioſa fames, & lauta gloria menſæ,	Vita redit: ſatiũ eſt populis fluuiuſq; Cereſq;.

O waſtfull Riot, neuer well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea farre fetcht and ſent:
Vaine glorie of a Table ſumptuous,
Learne with how little life may be preſerued,
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to carouſe,
But with the Brooke the peoples thirſt is ſerued:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not ſterued.

Pier. Hierog. l. 2. The Ægyptians affirme, that the longeſt time of mans life is a hundred yeares, becauſe the heart in a perfect bodie waxeth and groweth to ſtrength fiftie yeares, and afterwards by the ſame degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philoſophie, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twentie yeares, and Beroſus to a hundred and ſeuenteene yeares. Theſe opinions Plinie repeateth and reproueth, producing many Examples to the contrarie. In the laſt taxation, number and reuiew of the eighth Region of Italie, there were found in the Roll (ſaith Plinie) foure and fiftie perſons of an hundred yeares of age: ſeuen & fiftie of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and fiue and twentie: foure, of an hundred and thirtie: as many that were hundred and fiue & thirtie, or hundred and ſeuen and thirtie yeares old: & laſt of all three men of an hundred and fortie: and this ſearch was made in the times of Veſpaſian the Father and the Sonne.

Plin. l. 7. c. 29.

The ſimple dyet and temperate life of the Eſſeans gaue them long account of many yeares: ſo did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Perſians Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Neſtor liued three Ages, and Tireſias ſix, Sybilla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the leſſe Aſia little leſſe: Alſo Maſaniſſa of Numidia liued very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeares (ſaith Ephorus.) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that ſome of them liue full two hundred yeare: and ſo doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that theſe reports are not fabulous; Ioſephus bringeth many witneſſes with him ſelfe, as Marethon, Beroſus, Mochus, Eſtius, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecataus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume an Hiſtorian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeare 1570. there was an Indian preſented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Armie, who had out-liued three hundred yeares. I my ſelfe knew the old Counteſſe of Deſmond of Inchiquin in Munſter, who liued in the yeare 1589. and many yeares ſince, who was marryed in Edward the Fourths time, and held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Deſmond ſince then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munſter can witneſſe. Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Maffæus, and the like Authors, telleth of ſome that haue not only far exceeded the terme preſcribed by Epigenes; but beene repayred from the withered eſtate of decrepit Age to freſh youth. But for length of life, if wee note but the difference betweene the abilitie of men in thoſe dayes wherein Galen the Phiſician liued, it may eaſily proue vnto vs what Reeds we are in reſpect of thoſe Cedars of the firſt Age. For Galen did ordinarily let bloud ſix pound weight, whereas we (for the moſt part) ſtop at ſix Ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Conſtellations) which are the naturall cauſes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) ſtrong Parents, a pure and thin Ayre, and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heauy load of abundance, wherewith we oppresse & ouercharge Nature, maketh her to sinke vnawares in the midway; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Aire, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

and

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that ENOCH writ before the Floud.

A Fourth scruple hath beene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Storie thereof written, and if any such had beene, yet it is conceiued, that all memorie of Antiquitie perished in the Vniuersall Floud.

But if we consider the curiosity and policie of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Iewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoeuer was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publique dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wise men to a posteritie equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiueth) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but withall, secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he deliuered by mouth to Iosuah, and Iosuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas, then to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisedome began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as serued in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Iewes was an imitation: the inuention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

Dion. Areop.

Fol. 18.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiuing in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittaines, and of later times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rymers. If then such as would seeme wisest in the vse of reason, will not acknowledge, that the storie of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliuered vnto him by a more certaine presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserued and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniurie of the time and other hazzards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred fortie and three yeares, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse then fiue hundred yeares: and before Noah died, Abraham was fiftie and eight yeares old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinarie way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

Cabala est scientia theologiæ non reuelata, P. M. 82. Mirand. 110. fol.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the verie infancie of the World, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch: of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remayned euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Iude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia fœlix, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and storie of the first Age, seeing he might receiue it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Orig. Homil. 28. in Num. & Comment. in Euang. Ioan. Gelas. dist. 15.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoeuer some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to proue them vnwritten traditions, alleageth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoeuer was remembred out of them, the same was deliuered by Tradition from the Iewes. But I rather thinke with Pererius, that such a Booke there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Heretikes, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquitie thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Deuill about the bodie of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neyther Philo, nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquitie) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint AVGVSTINE, Scripsisse quidem nonnulla diuina ENOCH illum septimum ab ADAM negare non possumus: That ENOCH the seuenth from ADAM did write diuers diuine things we cannot denie. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquitie, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Booke was found amongst those Canonicall Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Iudaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preserued by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembred by Iude, no man can denie; how they were deliuered to posteritie I know not, whether by the Iewes Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainely) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heauens, and of the Natures and coniunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is verie probable that Noah had seene and might preserue this Booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath beene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methusalem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the vndoubted word of God need of any other proofe then self-authority.

Of the men of renowne before the Floud.

NOw let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publiquely to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Henoch the sonne of Iared, there is nothing remembred by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obayed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah: NOAH was a iust and vpright man in his time, and NOAH walked with God. The Seuentie conuert it, ENOCH placuit Deo; HENOCH pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (tulit eum Deus: scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh betweene the pietie of Henoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs, triarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to all else, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not dissolued as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses vseth these words, And he dyed; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, hee was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inuenibatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expresly added, that he saw not death.

Gen. 5. 24.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, which S. Paul promiseth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all dye, but all shall be changed, I leaue it to the learned Diuines. 1. Cor. 15. 51.

After Henoch, Moses passeth ouer to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophecied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, beeing the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Familie) preserued, because hee was an vpright man in his time, and feared God. Gen. 5. 29. Gen. 6. 9.

But of the warre, peace, gouernement, and policie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memorie remayning: whose stories if they had bin preserued, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the World, there could nothing of more delight haue beene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of necessitie must the same adde of wisedome and vndertakings? Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatsoeuer can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when wee no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to HIPPOCRATES: Vita breuis, ars longa, tempus praceps; (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of MOSES; These were mightie men, which in old time were men of renowne. But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and crueltie of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgat altogether the pietie of Seth, and the waies wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, onely euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersal, when the children and sonnes of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and mis-led by their idolatrous wiues, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, louing themselues and the world only. Aphor. 1. Gen. 6. 4. Vers. 5.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely, Lactantius and Eusebius, mis-led by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great aduantage, and haue troubled themselues with large answeres and very needlesse: the question being vncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrisostome and S. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his Commandements, should after a separatiou from the rest which fel with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi or Succubi, contrarie both to Nature and Grace, were more then madnesse to imagine. Gen. 6. v. 4.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by MOSES so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

OF these Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Gigantical then the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strayned his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (whosoeuer desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyrillus reproues the Grecians Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelesly,

That

That the Giants haue in elder times not onely caſt vp Mountaines vpon Mountaines, but remoued Iſlands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of caſting vp Hils, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the ſame was borrowed out of the ſtorie of Nimrod, as before remembred; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God ſaw the Daughters of Men, of whom the firſt Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Heſiodus, That Giants were the ſonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the ſonnes of God, and by the Earth the Daughters of men: which verſes of Orpheus are by Iohn Caſſam (who hath written a wittie diſcourſe of this ſubiect) thus changed into Latine:

Nomine cœleſtes illos dixêre Gigantes,
Orti quòd terrâ fuerint & ſanguine cœli.

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heauen, they came,
Whom thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and ſelfe-beleeuing men diſpute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceiue that there were in the firſt Age ſuch kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times ſince? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifeſtly, and common experience the other?

And for that ſuperlatiue ſtrayning of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppreſſors and Tyrants, and not to ſtrength of body and eminent ſtature: ſuch men might with better reaſon call them Oppreſſors, becauſe they were Giants, and therfore had abilitie to oppreſſe; then ſay, That they were called Giants only, becauſe Oppreſſors. For firſt, Moſes himſelfe calleth them mightie men; which ſheweth a ſtrength ſurpaſſing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vndertaking and aduenterous action. And if the ſame ſtature of body, and ability had not beene found among diuers Nations after the generall floud, then might this place of Moſes haue more willingly harkened to a diſpute, and yeelded to interpretation.

But beſides all theſe famous Giants found in prophane Hiſtories (which I will reſerue to accompanie the Giants of Albion, in the ſtorie of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerely and without all allegoricall conſtruction auow, That, beſides Nimrod, there were found of theſe Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moſes, of Ioſua, and of Dauid; namely, the Rephaims in Aſteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moſes (for ſtature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they alſo were taken for Giants as the Anakims: Likewiſe, where Moſes ſpeaketh of the Land of Ammon, he vſeth theſe words: That alſo was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: & whom the Ammonites call Zamzummins: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And theſe Giants called Rephaims in Aſteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouer-threw, aſſiſted by other Kings his aſſociates. Alſo the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giant-like ſtature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whoſe ſtrength to the Okes; and the Prophet BARVCH, Theſe were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of ſo great ſtature, and ſo expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Baſan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and foure cubits broad: for onely Og King of Baſan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Baſan, foure hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreouer, thoſe Diſcouerers and Searchers of the Land of Promiſe (ſent by Moſes from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great ſtature of thoſe people in generall, and eſpecially of the ſonnes of Anak, in theſe words: All the people which we ſaw in it are men of great ſtature: for there we ſaw Giants, the ſonnes of ANAK, which come of the Giants, ſo that we ſeemed in our ſights like Graſſe-hoppers, and ſo wee were in their ſight, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a maruellous difference betweene the Anakims and themſelues: inſomuch that the Iſraelites were ſo ſtricken with feare, as they rather ſought and deſired to return againe into Ægypt, and were more willing to endure their former ſlauerie, then to fall by the ſtrokes of thoſe fearefull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliah the Philiſtine of Gath, was a Giant of ſixe cubits and a ſpan long: the Armour which he wore waighed fiue thouſand ſhickles of braſſe: the ſhaft of his ſpeare was like a Weauers beame, and his ſpeare-head waighed ſixe hundred ſhickles of yron. Alſo in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath of another Goliah, surnamed Getheus, becauſe he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the firſt was ſlaine by Iehonathan, Dauids Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great ſtature, and his fingers were by ſixes, eüen foure & twenty. 1. Chron. 20. 1.

Alſo that Sampſon was of ſurpaſſing ſtrength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had beene a Kid, and after ſlue thirtie of the Philiſtines, and (after that) a thouſand more of them with a Iaw-bone of an Aſſe: And laſtly, hee tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Poſts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his ſhoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approued by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it ſelfe) infeebled and almoſt worne out the vertue of all things, then I ſay, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increaſed the curſe and corruption) brought forth her young ones more ſtrong and beautifull, than it did in after-ages: ſo alſo thoſe Giants, thoſe mightie men, and men of renowne as farre exceeded the proportion, nature, and ſtrength of thoſe Giants, remembred by Moſes of his owne time, and after him their ſucceſſors, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in generall, ſoone after the floud and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the firſt flouriſhing youth and newneſſe of the world. Iud. 14. 6. 14. 19. 16. 3.

But the wickedneſſe (eſpecially in crueltie and oppreſſion) of theſe men was ſuch, as God therefore by the floud gaue end to all fleſh, but to the iuſt Noah and his Family. And God repented him that hee had made man, which S. Auguſtine thus expoundeth: Neq; enim ſicut hominem, ita Deum facti ſui pœnitet, cuius eſt de omnibus omninò rebus tam fixa ſententia, quàm certa præſcientia. Sed ſi non vtatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non ſe quodammodo familiarius inſinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult eſſe conſultum: vt & perterreat ſuperbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alat intelligentes; God (ſaith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men vſe to doe) but if the Scripture did not vſe thoſe words or the like, it ſhould not (in a ſort) inſinuate it ſelfe familiarly to all ſorts of men, for whom it would prouide: that it might terrifie the proud, ſtir vp the negligent, exerciſe the ſearchers of truth, and nouriſh thoſe that vnderſtand. Gen. 6. 6. De Ciuit. Dei, l. 15. c. 15.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly riſing, and hardly at length vaniſhing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching theſe ancient times, obſcurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde ſome ſignes of more ancient truth.

HEre before we proceed any further, the occaſion offereth it ſelfe for vs to conſider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deliuering it ouer in a myſticall ſenſe, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue fought to obſcure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue thoſe inter-mixt diſcourſes of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets and Philoſophers, and not as any thing borrowed or ſtolne out of the Bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymiſt can aſwell by ſeparation of viſible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poyſon, as poyſon out of the moſt healthfull herbes and plants (all things hauing in themſelues both life and death) ſo, contrarie to the purpoſes and hopes of the Heathen, may thoſe which ſeeke after God and Truth finde out euery-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philoſophers, the Storie of the firſt Age, with all the works and maruailes thereof, amply and liuely expreſt.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselues were verie ancient: as in the Family of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

BVt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the general floud could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherite the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began soone after the floud to ascribe diuine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians did not onely learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue seuerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Ægyptios in vsu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutuatos, eosq; prius aras, & imagines, & templa Dijs sibi erexisse; The Egyptians (saith he) first deuised the names of the twelue gods, which the Greekes receyued from them, who first erected vnto themselues Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

Herod. in Euterpe.

§. III.

That in processe of time these lesser errours drew on greater: as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BVt as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander for euermore in vices vnknowne, and daily trauaile towards their eternall perdition: so did these grosse and blind Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gaue diuine reuerence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Paleneſſe, Sickneſſe, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and baſeſt of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner:

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7.

Bouem colis, ego Deũ macto bouem.
Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obsoniorum credidi suauissimum.
Carnes suillas tu caues, at gaudeo
Hijs maximè: canem colis, quem verbero
Edentem vbi deprehendo fortè obsonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.
I broyle the Egyptian Eeles, which you (as god) implore:
You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.
You worship Dogges, to beate them I thinke meet,
When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner IVVENAL.

Porrum aut cæpe nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to root vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their owne sowing Haue store of gods in euerie Garden growing!

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Ægyptians and others, the first Idols & Fables were inuented: and that the first IVPITER was CAIN, VVLCAN, TVBALCAIN, &c.

BVt in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselues there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient patterne they erected their building; were it not certayne, that the Ægyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoeuer was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or metall remayning after the Floud; and partly from Mizraim the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Ægyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fayned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, and Mercuries with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many prophane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Iupiter was said to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochij before remembred. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For, besides that many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo IOVE ædificatam: yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient IVPITER, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of MOSES: And CAIN dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochij were found after the Floud. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phornutus and Pausanias) and that to Iupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Floud, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which as his meaning he deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Floud.

This first Iupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sister (as also Iupiter is said to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de vrbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Iudæus conceiueth that Cain built sixe others, as Maich, Iared, Tebe, Iesca, Selet and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnicks had the inuention of Sacrifice: so were Iubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (inuentors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelyhood of name betweene Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venusta, or beautifull, Voluptas, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is found to be Venus, the Ladie of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Iupiter, Eua, Rhea, and Noema or Naamah the first Venus: so did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne arise, from the true Storie of the diuiding of the Earth betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent; which tempted Euah: so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the prophecies that Christ should breake the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captiuating Cerberus: so out of the taking vp of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conuersion of their Heroes (the inuentors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heauenly Signes, and (withall) that leauing of the World, and ascension of Astræa; of which Ouid:

Gen. 4. 20. 21. 22.

Vltima cœlestum terras Astræa reliquit;
Astræa last of heauenly Wights the Earth did leaue:

Ouid. Met. l. 1.

Nat. Com. l. 2. c. 2. For although thereby the Ethnicks would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue sayled, as it is a vertue abstract, and may bee considered without a person; yet as it is vsuall among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beautie or Lust by Venus, so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices, and therefore by Iustice and Astræa, Enoch: the iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner expresst, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was said to be a iust man; And NOAH walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more seene: for God tooke him away.

Vers. 1. Gen. 7. Gen. 5. 22. 24.

From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mightie men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vndertaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cornelius Seuerus thus describeth:

L. de Ciuit. Dei.

Tentauêre (nefas) olim detrudere mundo
Sydera, captiuiq; IOVIS transferre Gigantes
Imperium, & victo leges imponere cælo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe;
And robbing Ioue of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heauens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the starres, should bury them vnder the moysture of a second Floud, but that by this building (if they had beene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and couenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eight and twelfth of his Æneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. Who when he read the Booke of the Couenant, sprinkled the people with bloud.

Ioseph. l. 1 contra Appian.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Ægypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel; (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and successour Setho, of Seth; and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preserued, that the Ægyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Prouince Setheitica. We also finde in Bithynia the Citie of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Ægyptians did the Gracians borrow this kinde of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols, which the Ægyptians did to theirs.

Plut. in Iside. Strab. l. 17.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest IVPITERS; and the strange storie of the third.

BVt of all those armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Æther and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for æther is as much as shining or pure fire;) the other discouered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Cælum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The

The third of whom all the Gracian fables were deuiſed, was of Creet (now Candie) the ſonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iunans Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus, it ſignifieth life, but ſomewhat ſtrayned. Boccas in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiueth, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that ſtarre had ſuch a name, before the ſame was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moiſt, temperate, modeſt, honeſt, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing theſe inclinations. And therefore thoſe ancient Kings beautified with theſe conditions, might be called thereafter Iupiter; but howſoeuer they were, or were not with thoſe vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldeſt times aſſumed thoſe Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howſoeuer deſerued) as the worthyeſt, that euer were, acquired by their well deſeruings. Iones omnes Reges vocârunt antiqui; The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERS, as TZETZES in his Varia hiſtoria confirmeth: Reges olim IOVES vocârunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERS. But where this laſt and moſt remembred Iupiter was borne, it is vncertayne. Some there are that make him of Creet: others, that he was but ſent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be foſtered and hidden from the furie of Titan his vncle: becauſe it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a yonger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titans permiſſion, hee ſhould put to death all his male children, leſt the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their ſucceſſion; which agreement, becauſe Saturne performed in his firſt borne, it is fayned that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine; Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7

Haud ſit pinguior, | Saturne to be the fatter, is not knowne,
Crudis ſepulchrum quòd ſit ipſe filijs. | By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This compoſition betweene Titan and Saturne, Sybilla alſo witneſſeth in theſe;

Conceptis verbis; TITAN iurare coegit
SATVRNVM, de ſe natum ne nutriat vllum,
Quo poſſint regnare ſenis poſt fata Nepotes.
Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne ſweare
No ſonne to nouriſh; which by reigning might Vſurpe the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iuno, conueyed Iupiter (firſt called Lyſanias) into Crete, as ſhee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought vp in Gnoſſus, the chiefe Citie of that Iland, by Creſia the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof. Euſeb. in Temp.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Meſſena. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and firſt foſtering. Some affirme, that hee was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof hee changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting ſuch a god: others, that he was nouriſhed by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all theſe the idle Greekes haue many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he ſet on him, and tooke him and his wife priſoners, whom Iupiter againe reſcued and deliuered.

But laſtly, the father and the ſonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the leſſe powerfull fled into Italie, and left his Kingdomes in Greece to his ſonne. And although this Prince at the firſt purchaſed great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after hee was once ſetled and became potent, he gaue himſelfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adulterie, without all reſpect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by ſuch as doe aſcribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith ſatisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the ſinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others; and did not onely begin with inceſt, marrying his owne ſiſter Iuno, but he rauiſhed, betrayed, ſtole away, and tooke by ſtrong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom theſe hereafter written were of greateſt fame, Niobe, Laodemia, and Alcmena, the wife of Amphitryon, by whom hee had Pelaſgus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus; of whom the Mountayne Taygetus tooke name, with another ſonne called Saon, of whom Sauona by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Castor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus: by Iordana, Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protogenia, he had Athlius the father of Endymion: and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Ægypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Countrey tooke name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. Hee rauished Ægina the daughter of Æsopus, and carryed her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Ægina, on whom he begat Æacus: by Torrhebia hee had Arthesilaus and Carbius: by Ora, Colaxes: hee had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium and Troy. He begat the brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garumantis, Hiarbas. He had besides these (if they belye not their chiefe God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inuenters of Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were borne in ages so farre differing. And of these his seuerall rauishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens wiues, daughters, and sonnes, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into showres of gold, eagles, buls, birds, and beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Gracian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans feare to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke, de natura Deorum, affirme, that hee deserued nothing lesse; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Iupiter. His buriall was in Crete (saith LVCIAN.) Cretenses non solùm natum apud se & sepultum IOVEM testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt; The Cretians or Candians doe not onely auow that IVPITER was borne and buried among them, but they shew his graue and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remayned the monuments of his tombe in the Mountayne Iasius. This Callimachus in his hymnes also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, saith thus:

Luc. in Sacrif.

> The Cretians euer lyars were, they care not what they say:
> For they a tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu'st alway.

Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greeke Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Vranus (which signifieth Heauen) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god after his death. He had by many wiues 45 sons; but by his principall wife Titea, he had seuenteene sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that shee for her goodnesse was canonized as a goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heauen. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Basilea (which name sounding as Queene in English, shee is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as farre in vertue as in yeares, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sunne and Moone. The beautie and towardlinesse of these children mooued her brethren to enuy, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified vnto her in a dreame, that hee and his sister, by the prouidence of God, should become immortall, that also the Sunne and Moone should bee called by their names, and that their death should bee reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her selfe as a goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilest they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other sonnes of Vranus diuided the Kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the countries lying about the Mountaynes, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deepely skilfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Spheare, said to haue supported Heauen.

Diod. l. 2. c. 5.

He

He had many ſonnes; but the principall of them called Heſperus, being of his fathers qualities and ſtudies, was ſaid to haue beene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midſt of his contemplations, and his name in honour of him, impoſed by the people vpon the morning ſtarre. The ſeuen daughters of Atlas were alſo ſaid to haue beene excellent Ladies, who accompanying ſuch as came to be Deified, or regiſtred among the Worthies, brought forth children, anſwerable in qualitie to thoſe that begat them. Of theſe it is held, that the ſeuen ſtarres called Pleiades tooke name. Saturne, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italie. Iupiter, another of the ſonnes of Vranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten ſonnes which he called Curetes; he called that Iland after his wiues name, Idea; in which Ile hee dyed, and was buried. But this Iupiter muſt not haue beene that great one, but vncle to the great Iupiter, if theſe fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as theſe Libyans tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified ſtrong places, the better to keepe his people in ſubiection. His ſiſter Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in ſome part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerua, neare to the Riuer Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee alſo begat on Amalthea a ſonne called Bacchus, whom hee cauſed ſecretly, for feare of his life, to be brought vp at Nyſa, an Iland in the Riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerua, and certayne Nymphs. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly Countrey, that lay on the Sea-coaſt, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard theſe newes, ſhee fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely entertayned her as a ſiſter, but tooke her to wife, and at her inſtigation made warre vpon Hammon, vanquiſhed him by aſſiſtance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Iupiters children before mentioned, held the Iland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women, as may ſeeme, being very gracious in thoſe times) the Kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper yong man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things elſe commodious for mankinde, before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was comming againſt him with the Titanes; hee leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons, liuing not farre from Nyſa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profeſſion. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they ſet forward againſt Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes priſoners, returned to Nyſa; where pardoning the priſoners, that promiſed to become his true followers, he prepared for a ſecond Expedition. In the ſecond Expedition he behaued himſelfe ſo well, that he vvan the loue of all the people by vvhom he paſſed; inſomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturnes rigorous gouernment, he was greatly ſtrengthened, and the enemie as much infeebled by daily reuolts. Comming to the Citie of Hammon, he wan a battaile of Saturne, before the very walls. After which, Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, ſetting the Towne on fire to deſpight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong ſonne by Rhea, called Iupiter. This child, Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the Eaſt Countries; and comming into Egypt, he left this Iupiter, being then a boy, Gouernour of the Countrey; but appointed vnto him as an Ouer-ſeer, one Olympus, of whom Iupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whileſt Bacchus trauailed through all Nations, as farre as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Iupiter from Egypt, and his ſiſter Minerua, together with the reſt, that afterwards were held as gods, ioyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chaſed them, tooke, and ſlue them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Iupiter, the ſonne of Saturne, ſucceeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes left aliue, nor any other to diſturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Oſiris, there is a rude reſemblance, that may cauſe them both to be taken for the crooked Images of ſome one true hiſtorie. For the Expeditions of Oſiris, and of Bacchus; the warres of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the Kingdome of Egypt giuen by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Iupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the cymbals of Basilea, with many petty circumstances, meerely enough resemble each other, howsoeuer not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniato (as Euseb. 1.1.c.7. Eusebius cites him) would haue all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no allegorie. Yet hee makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Vranus or Heauen for daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus haue enough. To the Genealogie he addes Elius or the Sunne, as father of Vranus, and among the children of Vranus, Iapetus, Batilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giuing withall to Vranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturne, but omitting Iupiter of Crete. The Pedigree of them is this:

of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

OF Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greekes but Saluages, if they seeke no farther off for their Gods.

But the Ægyptians, euen after the floud, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizraim, Iupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucer;) neither yet is his owne much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heate: because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot and scortching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes and Romans the most renowned) it is certaine that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his sonnes is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which liued in that age of Priamus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed. Peucer. de Oracul.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortall among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deitie be denied vnto Laurentia and Flora, which was giuen to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

BVt that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleeued in any of these fooleries, it cannot bee suspected, though some of them (ouer-busily) haue mixed their owne inuentions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the books of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatise conuerted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though hee dissembled in some things, for feare of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirificè ijs delectatus est, quæ de vno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howsoeuer Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Ægyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Iewes, and bookes of Moses: Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleeue the contrarie, thinking that from thence hee tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or sauouring of Diuinitie: and the same opinion had Saint Ambrose of Pythagoras. Euseb. Prep. Euang. lib. 11. Cyril cont. Iul. lib. Origen. cont. Celsum. Ambr. ad Iren. Ep. 6. lib. 1

But whether it were out of the same vanitie, which possest all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which hee had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the seueritie of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson, I cannot iudge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Platoes feare, whose wordes among many other of the same effect, are these; PLATO MOSIS mentionem facere, ob id, quod vnum solumq; Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putauit, veritus Areopagum; PLATO fearing the Areopagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenians to make mention of MOSES, that hee taught that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in TIMÆO; id ipsum de Deo disseruit quod & MOSES; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith IVSTINE MARTYR) which MOSES did. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answere MOSES, Ego sum existens (which is) I am; and, existens misit me ad vos; I am hath sent me vnto you, herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ then that Moses vsed the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: MOSES enim qui existit (inquit,) PLATO quod Areopagus, or domus seu mons Martis, Mars his hill: a house wherein capitall matters were tryed: so called at first because Mars therein first pleaded his cause for the murder of Hallirrothes. Pausan. in Attic. Nat. Com. l. 2. c. 7 Iust. Mart. adm. Gent. fol. 8. 14. vt sup. Exod. 3. 14.

quod existit; For MOSES saith, He who is; PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same, hee giueth this testimonie: Genitorem Vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quàm inuentum impossibile dignè profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maiestie of Gods Nature, then this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The loue of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. APVLEIVS the Platonist: Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam naturæ dignitate: Et nihil est Deo simílius & gratius, quàm vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cæpit; Because he neuer had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was euerywhere present and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses storie of the Creation, then this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

Laertius.

Cælum terraq́, vnius formæ fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abiuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, feræ, quasq́, affert mare,
Genusq́, mortalium.

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when disioyned once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we find the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who euery-where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God, though he vse the name of Iupiter, thereby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time; but that hee could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which hee doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDVLA) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipientium dæmonum, à quibus malum & non bonum prouenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq́, sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Deuils, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall & diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following teach vs: Respiciens verò ad diuinum hunc sermonem ea diligenter animum aduerte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truely lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone
All else; in which hee's still, nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee sees all.

The firſt of all is GOD, and the ſame laſt is he.
GOD is the head and midſt, yea from him all things be.
GOD is the Baſe of earth, and of the ſtarred skie.
He is the male and female too, ſhall neuer die.
The ſpirit of all is GOD, the SVNNE and MOONE, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For cloſe in holy breſt he all did comprehend,
Whence all to bleſſed light, his wondrous power did ſend.

Now beſides theſe former teſtimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not ſo ſtupid and ignorant, as the Ægyptians, Gracians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will onely repeate two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to thoſe large and learned Collections of Iuſtine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Euſebius, Eugubinus, Peucer, Pleſsis, Daneus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, deſcribed him by theſe attributes and properties: Bonus, iuſtus, ſanctus, ſeipſum poſsidens, vtilis, ſpecioſus, optimus, ſeuerus, liber, ſemper commodus, tutus, glorioſus, charitas, &c. Good, iuſt, holy, poſſeſsing himſelfe, profitable, beautifull, beſt, ſeuere, free, alwayes doing good, ſafe without feare, glorious and ſelfe-charitie. EPICHARMVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euery nature, was onely and euery where powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS: Rex omnium ipſe ſolus; Hee is the only King of Kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator ſummus, atq; optimus artifex, qui progreſſus ſingulis diuerſos ſecundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the moſt high Creator, and beſt artificer, who giueth to euery thing diuers proceedings according to their deſerts. This God (ſaith ANTISTHENES) cannot bee reſembled to any thing, and therefore not elſewhere knowne; Niſi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes: Saue onely in that euerlaſting Country, whoſe image thou haſt none at all. Hereof alſo XENOPHANES COLOPHONIVS: Vnus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus ſimilis; There is one God among gods and men moſt powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like vnto mortals: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quieſcere facit, magnus potenſq;, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma ſit, nemini patet, niſi ipſi ſoli, qui luce ſua omnia perluſtrat; God who ſhaketh all things, and ſetteth all things at reſt, is great and mightie, as is manifeſt to all: but of what forme hee is, it is manifeſt to none, ſaue onely to himſelfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato ſaith: Totius rerum naturæ cauſa, & ratio, & origo Deus, ſummus animi genitor, æternus animantium ſoſpitator, aſsiduus mundi ſui opifex, ſine propagatione genitor, neq; loco, neq; tempore vllo comprehenſus, eoq; paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cauſe, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the moſt high Father of the ſoule, the eternall preſeruer of liuing creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefor e few can conceiue him in thought, none can expreſſe what hee is. Therefore was it ſaid by S. HIEROME, Si enim cunctos Philoſophorum reuoluas libros, neceſſe eſt vt in eis reperias aliquam partem vaſorum Dei, vt apud PLATONEM, fabricaterem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas &c. If thou conſider all the bookes of the Philoſophers, thou canſt not but find in them ſome part of the Veſſels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: In ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortall ſoules, &c. Hieron. in Com. in Dan. In princip.

And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wiſedome of all Ages, wee ſhall finde that there neuer was man of ſolid vnderſtanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whoſe minde the Arte of education hath not bended; whoſe eyes a fooliſh ſuperſtition hath not afterward blinded; whoſe apprehenſions are ſober, and by a penſiue inſpection aduiſed; but that he hath found by an vnreſiſtable neceſſitie, one true God, and euerlaſting being, all for euer cauſing, and all for euer ſuſtayning; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly expreſt, then that Ægyptian Hermes, howſoeuer it fayled afterward in his poſteritie: all being at length by deuilliſh policie of the Ægyptian Prieſts purpoſely obſcured; who inuented new gods, and thoſe innumerable, beſt ſorting (as the Deuill perſwaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fitteſt to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heatheniſme and Iudaiſme, after many wounds, were at length about the ſame time vnder IVLIAN miraculouſly confounded.

BVt all theſe are againe vaniſhed: for the inuentions of mortall men are no leſſe mortall then themſelues. The Fire, which the Chaldæans worſhipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fuell ſtarueth, water quencheth, and want of ayre ſuffocateth: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielouſies; Death hath perſwaded him to chaſtitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it ſelfe, hath alſo eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, their ſtately Temples of ſtone and durefull Marble. The houſes and ſumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the Earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple conſecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Theſſalia, or elſewhere, that can aske counſaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apolloes Prieſts are become ſpeechleſſe; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfait Ægyptians, and coozening Aſtrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to theſe his ouer-throwes and diſhonours; for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe Manſions) was many times robbed, burnt, and deſtroyed; yet by his diligence the ſame was often enriched, repayred, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himſelfe it receiued the laſt and vtter ſubuerſion. For it was firſt robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubœan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vtterly ſackt; Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the ſonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fiftly, by the Captaines of the Phocenſes: Sixtly, by Nero, who carried thence fiue hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe ſet vp at the common charge. But whatſoeuer was gathered betweene the time of Nero and Conſtantine, the Chriſtian Armie made ſpoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithſtanding all this it was againe glorioully rebuilt, and ſo remayned till ſuch time as Iulian the Apoſtata ſent thither to know the ſucceſſe of his Parthian enterpriſe, at which time it was vtterly burnt and conſumed with fire from Heauen; and the Image of Apollo himſelfe, and all the reſt of the Idols therein molten downe and loſt in the earth.

The like ſucceſſe had the Iewes in the ſame Iulians time, when by his permiſſion they aſſembled themſelues to rebuild the Temple of Hieruſalem: for while they were buſied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thouſands of the Iewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others ſlaine, and ſcattered by Tempeſt and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Iewes, aſcribing this to the nature of that Element. For, ſaith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Iudæa, being by Iulian buſied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire iſſuing neere the foundation, and oft conſuming the Workemen, made the enterprize fruſtrate.

Am. Mar. l. 23. cap. 1.

Of the laſt refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

NOw the Deuill, becauſe hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in thoſe dayes) and being ſtill as induſtrious as euer, findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectuall adoration of himſelfe then euer. For whereas hee firſt taught them to ſacrifice to Monſters, to dead ſtones cut into faces of Beaſts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now ſets before them the high and ſhining Idoll of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that truth is the Goddeſſe of dangers and oppreſſions: that chaſtitie is the enemie of Nature; and laſtly, that as all vertue (in generall) is without taſte: ſo pleaſure ſatisfieth and delighteth euery ſenſe: for true wiſedome (ſaith he) is exerciſed in nothing elſe, then in the obtayning of power to oppreſſe, and of riches to maintayne plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician find in his pupils any remorſe, any feeling or feare of Gods future Iudgement, he perſwades them that God hath ſo great neede of mens ſoules, that he

he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeuours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged pouertie, and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouer-growne with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperitie by the other: at the entrance of the one wee find our sufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetousnesse, licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemie was euer most diligent: so is he now more laborious than euer: the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an euening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.
Of NOAHS Floud.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAHS Floud.

OF this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regionem migrauit: He departed with his children, and trauailed into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berosus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnaturall wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religionis & Deorum, contemners of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (saith Berosus) vnus erat qui Deorum verentior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods then the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sonnes Sem, Iaphetus, and Cham, and with their Wiues, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserued themselues in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God sayd vnto NOAH, Make thee an Arke of Pine-trees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell Generations were alreadie fashioned in the Cloudes, which soone after should swallow vp and couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the Ayre: Noah and his family excepted.

Gen. 6. 14. v. 13.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not beene receiued by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum obuoluta in obscuro veritas latet: Whilst the truth lieth wrapt vp in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniuersalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Floud of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue beene many other Flouds (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholaus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by IOSEPHVS: Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca deuectum in huius vertice hasisse, lignorumq; reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam MOSES Iudæorum Legislator scribit: thus farre this Author. There is (saith he) aboue Minyada (or the Countrey of Minya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saued in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountayne, whereon there remayned a long time after certayne pieces thereof; and this might bee the same, of which MOSES the Law-giuer of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmudists (saith Annius) that many Giants saued themselues vpon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoeuer he haue beene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Floud, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua vniuersus periit Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World vniuersall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, and his three Sons with their wiues (in all eight persons) were only saued.

§. II.

Of the Floud in the time of OGYGES: and that this was not NOAHS Floud.

BVt from the vanitie of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth, (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the errour first of all: who therein flattering themselues also, sought to perswade the world, that there was no Floud preceded the Floud of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodoginus;) OGYGVM id appellant Poetæ, tanquàm peruetus dixeris; ab OGYGE vetustissimo: The Poets gaue the name of OGYGIA to things exceeding ancient, as of OGYGES the most ancient.

Rhod.l.15.c.33.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he liued but in Iacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regnâsse autument hunc: vnde sit CADMVS qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, à boue iugulato sic nuncupatas; quoniam Syrorum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this OGYGES did reigne in Ægypt, whereby he should be CADMVS, who trauailing into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beefe slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe.

Euseb. de præp. Euang. l.10.c.3. Ca.22.

But this Floud of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Floud of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. betweene these Flouds, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this ouerflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet whosoeuer makes it most ancient, finds about 500. yeeres difference betwene that and the generall Floud.

Lib.1.c.7.

For Paulus Orosius affirmes, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040 yeeres before Rome built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Floud preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres; and the Floud of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if we place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betweene these two Flouds must be 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Priscus, as some doe) it appeares by this, that the Floud of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the bankes of Archi-pelago, or the Ægean Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie, and Solinus witnesse, that the Citie of Ioppe in Indæa was founded before the Floud; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remayned on certayne Altars of stone the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Floud of Ogyges spred it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed vp (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus) of which Ouid:

Of this Floud of Ogyges was inuented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Cœus, the ſonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with child, Iuno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they ſay) no part of the Earth to be deliuerd on; and withall, cauſed the monſtrous Serpent Python to follow & affright her, whereſoeuer ſhe trauelled: till at length arriuing at the Ile of Ortygia, ſhe was there receiued; in which ſhe was deliuered, firſt of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins: whereof Barlaam makes this expoſition: That at ſuch time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceaſed, out of the abundant moiſture of the Earth (heat by putrifaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled ſuch thick miſts and fogges, that in Attica, and along the Coaſts of the Ægean Sea, neyther the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceiued by the inhabitants: ſo as when at length (the Earth being dryed, and theſe vapours diſſipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Ortygia eſpyed the light of the Moone ſomewhat before day, and in the ſame morning the Sunne alſo appeared: fabulouſly (becauſe Diana repreſented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which ſignifieth manifeſtation. Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 8. Plin. l. 4. c. 11.

And ſurely it is not improbable, that the Floud of Ogyges being ſo great, as Hiſtories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, ſenſibly diſcerned in thoſe parts, and ſome vnuſuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Auguſtine) reporteth out of Caſtor, that ſo great a miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was ſeene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatneſſe, the figure, and the courſe of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adraſtus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, l. 21. cap. 8.

Now concerning the courſe of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read of ſo good Aſtrologers flouriſhing among the Greekes, or elſewhere in thoſe dayes, as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets ſo exact, that it ſhould need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude. I ſee no reaſon, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, ſhould be held miraculous, conſidering, that leſſer miſts and fogges than thoſe which couered Greece with ſo long darkneſſe, doe familiarly preſent our ſenſes with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure ſhould varie, queſtionleſſe it was very ſtrange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it ſtands well with good reaſon, that the ſide of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightned by him, the oppoſite halfe ſhould remaine ſhadowed; whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, deſcrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth ſeeme; if diſtance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehenſion of our ſenſes.

A worthy Aſtrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perſpectiue Glaſſes hath found in the Starres many things vnknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth ſo much to haue beene diſcouered in Venus, by his late obſeruations. Whether ſome watrie diſpoſition of the ayre might preſent as much to them that liued with Ogyges, as Galileus hath ſeene through his Inſtrument; I cannot tell: ſure I am, that the diſcouerie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather conuince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Floud of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Auguſtine) accompanied with ſuch vnuſuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) ſignes, teſtifying the concurrence of cauſes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Floud of Noah, which was generall, and altogether miraculous, may ſeeme to haue had no other token, or fore-ſhewing, then the long preaching of Noah himſelfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Floud came ſuddenly, and tooke them all away. Luke 17. v. 27.

§. III.

Of DEVCALIONS Flood: and that this was not NOAHS Flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall Flood.

A Second Floud of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which, S. Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (vt VARRO scribit) regnante Athenienſibus CRANAO, ſucceſſore CECROPIS (vt autem noſtri, EVSEBIVS & HIERONYMVS*) adhuc eodem* CECROPE permanente, diluuium fuit, quod appellatum eſt DEVCALIONIS: (that is) In theſe times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANAVS the ſucceſſor of CECROPS gouerning the Athenians, or (as our EVSEBIVS and HIEROME ſay) CECROPS yet liuing, that Floud (called DEVCALIONS*) happened.*

And in the beginning of the eleuenth Chapter of the ſame eighteenth Booke, he vſeth theſe words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Ægypto populum Dei nouiſſimo tempore CECROPIS Athenienſium Regis, cum apud Aſſyrios regnaret ASCATADES, apud Sicyonios MARATHVS, apud Argiues TRIOPAS: MOSES led the people of God out of Ægypt about the latter times of CECROPS King of the Athenians, ASCATADES raigning ouer the Aſſyrians, ouer the Sicyonians MARATHVS, and ouer the Argiues TRIOPAS. So as leauing the curioſitie of a few yeeres, more or leſſe, it appeareth, that this Floud of Deucalion was eyther at the egreſſion of the children of Iſrael out of Ægypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753. yeeres, according to Funcius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeere of the World 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giuing vnto Deucalion 40. yeeres of age when this Floud happened, it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approued Hiſtorians is ſaid to haue beene 82. yeeres old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Floud of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëtons time, by the reigne of Crotopus, King of the Argiues; but Crotopus liued King of the Argiues ſixe yeeres after Iſrael departed Ægypt, which makes twentie yeeres difference, according to Funcius, who will haue this Floud and Burning to haue fallen 14. yeeres before Moſes left Ægypt, ſo he gaue of the Worlds yeeres to the Floud and Burning the yeere 2440. and to Moſes his egreſſion the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinkes that Moſes was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Floud of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the Floud of Ogyges, which is denyed by all [illegible] (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at leaſt 250. yeeres, or thereabouts. Euſebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and ſo doth P. Oroſius: Euſebius about the 50. yeere of Moſes life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Floud 770. yeeres: for theſe be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Grecia tempore quidem PHORONEI, qui fuit poſt INACHVM, inundatio quæ fuit tempore OGYGIS: There happened in Greece in the time of PHORNEVS, who liued after INACHVS, the Floud of OGYGES. Now if the Floud of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeeres before the firſt Olympiad, according to Euſebius and Oroſius, (as before) then is it manifeſt, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it fals out, that Ogyges Floud happened before the Hebrewes left Ægypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference betweene the opinions of Euſebius and Oroſius. And for my ſelfe (who rather follow thoſe Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Floud, then the reſt) I reckon the times which come betweene theſe Flouds in this ſort. The generall Floud was in the yeere of the World 1656. Iacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. ſo as from the beginning of the Floud to Iacobs birth, there were conſumed 513. yeeres. Ogyges Floud happened 100. yeeres after Iacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Floud 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the World 2356. and had liued 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Theſſalie was ouerwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Floud was after Noahs Floud ended, 782. yeeres. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres betweene the generall Floud and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Floud of Theſſalie followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are theſe: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEVCALIONIS, ſecundo anno SPHAERI, ſeptingenti ſupputantur anni, qui natus anno duos & octoginta Theſſaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of DEVCALION, in the ſecond yeere yeere of SRHARRVS, are numbred 700. yeeres, and when DEVCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Floud happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesse Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Floud of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinkes it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not onely ouer Thessalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward, but it couered the greatest part of Italie: and eyther the same, or some other particular Floud then happening, oppreſt Egypt, sayth Eusebius. And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or faine it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, sayth Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) sayd to be the preseruer of Mankind. That this Floud couered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable; who affirme, that the people then inhabiting Italie, were therefore called Iuuem: quia ab imbribus diluuio superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which Vmbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Bruty, and all others inhabiting anciently the bankes of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Floud of Noah, and so tooke name by saning themselues vpon the Appenine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs; shewing who, and who onely then were preserued: which is sufficient. Report hath aduentured further, telling vs, that the first people which after the generall Floud inhabited Italie, were the Camesenes; (so named from Camese, whom GATO in originibus, another of Annius his Authors, names for a consort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a sauage life; till such time as Saturne arriuing on those Coasts, deuised Lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepus Cassius and Varro among the Latines haue preserued; and of whom Virgil:

Primus ab aethereo venit SATVRNVS Olympo,
Arma IOVIS fugiens, & regnis exul ademptis,
Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis
Composuit, Legesq; dedit; Latiumq; vocari Maluit.
SATVRNE descending from the Heauens high,
Fearing the Armes of IVPITER his Sonne,
His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence, doth flie.
Rude people on the Mountayne tops he wonne
To liue together, and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which againe sought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venere Sicani,
Then came th' Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sat downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue testimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligy, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Vmbri, descended of the Gaules (saith Annius) not of those Gaules of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, euen all Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionysius haue assured vs: and therefore this Floud of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossest of Italie again, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being. So that Kingdome was first called Camasene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions Floud happened) possest the same, about 306. yeeres before the Warre of Troy: Lycaon then gouerning Arcadia; who being the father of two and twentie sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius inuaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held vntill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After these, came

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Vmbri, in those parts, I doe not affirme; hauing respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinkes, that the name was deriued from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these Vmbri of Italie were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

§. IIII.

Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall Floud: and of two ancient Deluges in Ægypt; and of some elsewhere.

SAint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the Vniuersall Floud, because they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembred) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successiuely planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine Letters was not receiued, finde no Parent of more antiquitie, than such as they had themselues, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselues to be Indigenæ, and growing out of the Earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldæans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Floud, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heare-say, that some Giants saued themselues vpon the Mountaines Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authoritie approued: vsing the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth Euſ. de prep. Euang. l. 9. c. 4. a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth, that Sisithrus, to preserue himselfe from a Floud fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hils of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which hee also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were couered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs Floud.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Floud. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Ægyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Ægypt, the storie of the Floud vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Floud, Diod. l. 1. which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall Floud for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old OGYGES, Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Belochus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not beleeue him as touching the time. But this Floud couered a great part of the nether Ægypt, especially all that Region subiect to Pro-
Nat. Com. l. 4. c. 6 metheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his Liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Ægypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus delinereth in these words: Fluuium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemq; aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, HERCVLEM cum consilij magnitudine, tum virtute, voluntè vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum conuertisse: Vnde & Græci quidam Poeta rem gestam in fabulam verientes, HERCVLEM traduut Aquilam PROMETHEI iecur depascentem occidisse; This Floud (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but HERCVLES by his great iudgement and vertue did againe compresse and straighten this Riuer, so farre extended and ouer-spred, turning it into the old channels: Whence certaine Greeke Poets (conuerting this labour and worke of HERCVLES into a fable) fable) deuiſed, that HERCVLES ſlew the Eagle which fed on PROMETHEVS Liuer; meaning that he deliuered Prometheus of that ſorrow and torment, which for the loſſe of his People and Countrey (by the Waters deſtroyed and couered ouer) he ſuffered.

A fourth Floud chanced about Pharus in Ægypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiueth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe ſort writeth of all theſe Inundations: Inundationes plures fuere: prima nouimeſtris inundatio terrarum ſub priſco OGYGE: ſecunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (ſaith this ſame Xenophon:) the firſt, which was vniuerſall, of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the firſt OGYGES: the ſecond was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Ægyptians: a third of two Moneths, vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths, in Theſſalia, vnder Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proteus of Ægypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the Samothraces for his Authors, remembreth a Floud in Aſia the leſſe, and elſewhere, of no leſſe deſtruction then any of the other particular Inundations, ſaying, that the ſame happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Helleſpont breaking in ouer the Land.

Xenop. de æquin. Comm. per Annium, fol. 37.

But there haue been many Flouds in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of theſe two laſt remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Ægypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the ſame yeere, Gregorie then being Biſhop of Rome, there happened a maruellous ouerflowing in Italie, and eſpecially in the Venetian Territorie, and in Liguria, accompanied with a moſt fearefull ſtorme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reaſon of the many dead Serpents caſt vp and left vpon the Land, after the Waters decreaſed and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there periſhed 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordroch in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Trithemius ſpeaketh of an Earthquake, which ſwallowed many thouſands: and after that, of a Floud in Frieſeland, in which there periſhed 100000. perſons. Stroſius Sigog. in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damaſus, in which alſo many Cities of Sicil were ſwallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the ſixt: alſo in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He alſo remembreth a perillous ouer-flowing in Polonia, about Cracouia, by which many people periſhed. Likewiſe Viginier a French Hiſtorian ſpeaketh of a great Floud in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with ſo dreadfull a tempeſt, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Iudgement Day; ſaying, That by the violent deſcent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Niſmes there were remoued diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Siluer and Gold, diuers pieces of Plate, and Veſſels of other Mettall, ſuppoſed to be hidden at ſuch time as the Gothes inuaded that Prouince, in the yeere 1156.

§. V.

That the Floud of NOAH was ſupernaturall, though ſome ſay it might haue beene fore-ſeene by the Starres.

NOw howſoeuer all theſe Flouds, and many other, which haue couered at ſeuerall times ſeuerall Regions, not onely in theſe parts of the World, but in America alſo, (as I haue learned of ſome ancient Southſayers among them) may be aſcribed to naturall cauſes and accidents; yet that vniuerſall Floud (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the Earth by a power aboue Nature, and by the eſpeciall commandement of God himſelfe, who at that time gaue ſtrength of influence to the Starres, and abundance to the Fountaines of the Deepe: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of Nature could effect, or any ſecond cauſes by whatſoeuer vnion could performe, without receiuing from the Fountaine of all power ſtrength, and faculties ſupernaturall. Henricus Mechlinienſis, a Scholler of Alberti Magni, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Albu Maſar obſerueth, that before the Floud of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the laſt degree of Cancer, againſt that conſtellation ſince called the Ship of Argos; by which the Floud of Noah might be fore-told, becauſe Cancer is both a watrie Signe, and the Houſe of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moysture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not onely signes, but also working causes, by strength receiued from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by Catarractæ Cœli (Englished the Windores of Heauen) Moses meant this great and watrie coniunction; the word (Catarractæ) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Also de Concordia Theolog. & Astrolog. Gen 7.11.

* The word ἀναχύσεως properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carryed downwards, dasheth and breaketh; of ἀράσσω, allido, or frango. Hence, because Windores doe not only open, but also shut, the word hath been expounded (Windores) for Barres or Floud-gates.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood, that the words Catarractæ Cœli, or Windores of Heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these watrie Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum Catarractas Cœli vocâsse, nisi partes illas Cœli, quæ generatiuæ sunt pluuiarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, vt Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Catarractæ Cœli, or Windores of Heauen) vnlesse he thereby vnderstand those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendred the Raine, and Inundations of Waters, such as are the watrie Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable Wisdome this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gaue to euery operation encrease of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaynes, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoeuer else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the vniuersall Floud: and what are Catarractæ Cœli,

GEN. 7. VERS. 11.

NOw if it be obiected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God rested the seuenth day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable World fifteene Cubits aboue the highest Mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrayned himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to ouer-couer the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken vp (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoeuer was dispersed therein, pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had aboue one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand fiue hundred miles: Take then the highest Mountaine of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaines of Armenia, or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Temerif, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth aboue thirtie miles vpright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand fiue hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles vpright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken vp, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre ouer and aboue it, wee shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre, as euery where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conuersion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements, it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Alliacensis, to which I may adde Berosus and others, That such a coniunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catarractæ Cœli, or Windores of Heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needes no other answere then that obseruation of Ludouicus Viues, who affirmeth, That by the graueſt Astrologian it was obserued, that in the yeere 1524. there should happen the like coniunction as at Noahs Floud; then which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seasonable yeere: the like destruction was prophecied of the yeere 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proueth, that there could not be any such coniunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Catarractæ Cœli, then that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For whosoeuer hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts, (where clouds doe not breake into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windores or Floud-gates of Heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell contrarie to custome, and that order which wee call naturall. God then loosened the power retentiue in the vppermost ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (sayth Iob) he which holdeth the Waters, and they drie up, or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dryed vp; but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the Waters in the Clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the generall Floud, and called vp the Waters which slept in the great Deepe; and these ioyning together, couered the Earth, till they had performed the worke of his will; which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast Caues, and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops. Iob c.12.v.15. Gen.8.1.

Of some remainder of the memorie of Noah among the Heathen.

Noah commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wiues, taking with them of euery Creature which tooke life by generation, seuen of the cleane, and of the vncleane, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietnesse: after others, and according to the prophecie of his Father Lamech, cessation, to whom after-times gaue many Names, answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Floud of Achaia. Saturne (they called him) because he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the Name of Promethem, who was said to steale away Iupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heauenly things. Others thinke, that he was so called for his excellent wisedome and foresight. He had also the Name of Ianus, (id est) vinosus, because Iain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian findes him written in Libris Ritualibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Janus, and Iane: which three enioyed an elder time then all the other ancientest fayned gods. And this Name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vse before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pictor giueth this testimonie: Iani ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum haserat vlla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populus docuit Ianvs ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomaria & sacra docuit. In the time of Janus (saith he) there was no Monarchie, for the desire of rule had not then fixed it selfe about the hearts of men. Janus first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meale: he first set vp Altars, instituted Gardens, and solitarie Groues, wherein they vsed to pray, with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimonie then this, cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all points so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soueraigne authoritie. Secondly, Noah after the Floud was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the First-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that reared an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God, a thanksgiuing Gen.9.20. Gen.8.20.

Siculus* and Alex. Aphrodiſeus ſo call, becauſe he was the reſtorer of the Greekes to their former libertie; but in reſpect of the Floud. For the Greekes called Liberyas, and his Nurſes Hyades, of Rayne, becauſe Noah entred the Arke when the Sunne ioyned with the Starres Hyades, a conſtellation in the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and euer after a Monument of Noahs Floud. He was alſo by others ſurnamed Triton, a Marine god, the ſonne of Nepiune; becauſe he liued in ſafetie on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name

Nat Com.l.5. c.13. of Dionyſius, quaſi Διανοσπαστης, mentem pungens, Bite-braine, or Wit-ſtinger; though Diodorus conceiue otherwiſe, and deriue that name à patre & loco; Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Niſa, a Towne of Arabia fælix, ſaith Suidas out of Orpheus. Hee had alſo the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; becauſe hee firſt yoked Cælius. Oxen, and tylled the ground: according to that of Moſes; And NOAH became an Husbandman. Now howſoeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwiſe Dionyſus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Inuention ſtolne from Noah.

Gen.9.20. Stuck. in libris conuiualibus, & Danæus de prima mundi ætate. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Boäcus, was taken (ſaith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, becauſe it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the firſt planter of the Vine after the Floud: and of Noah (the firſt and ancient Bacchus) were all thoſe fables deuiſed, of which Diodorus complayneth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This firſt Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was ſurnamed Nyſius, of the Mountaine Nyſa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatſoeuer themſelues faine of his enterpriſes: and theſe Mountaines of Nyſa ioyne with thoſe of Paropaniſus, and thoſe other Eaſterne Mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah reſted after the Floud.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this ſecond Parent of Mankind might the better be preſerued, there were founded by his Iſſues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Riuers and Mountaines; which oftentimes forgat that it was done in his regard, becauſe the many Names giuen him brought the ſame confuſion to places as to himſelfe. Notwithſtanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah vpon the bankes of the red Sea, and elſewhere: the Riuer of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomie, Danus; diuiding Illyria from Panonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of ſundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, faſhion, and name.

NOw in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the Scriptures, neyther doe I finde any approued Author that hath written thereof: onely Genebrus Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiueth, that Noah built his Arke neere the Mountaines of Caucaſus, becauſe on thoſe Hils are found the goodlieſt Cedars: for when Alexander Macedon made the warre among a people, called Nyſæi, inhabiting the other ſide of Caucaſus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar. To this place (ſaith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to ſeparate himſelfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled againſt God and Nature, as alſo becauſe he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which alſo he addeth the conueniencie of Riuers, to tranſport the Timber which he vſed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Onely

Onely this we are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World; and to my vnderstanding, not farre from the place where it rested after the Floud. For Noah did not vse any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue, then the Hulke or Body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to passe vpon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. Gen.8.1. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible Winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottome, and not raysed in forme of a Ship, with a sharpenesse forward, to cut the waues, for the better speed.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Deucalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes he arriued, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinkes that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inuentor of Auguration. Steph. de Vrb. fol. 227.

Pererius findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinkes it deriued from the Hebrew word Nahas, which signifieth Auguration and Diuination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Leafe before cited. De Oracul fol. 94

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lyeth the difference betweene Aron and Theuet, That Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it selfe vpon the Waters. Epiph. in Ancor.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship in this, that it had a Couer and Roofe, with a Crest in the middest thereof, and the sides declining like the Roofe of an House; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselues from the noysomenesse of the many Beasts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke. Gen.6.4.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vsed, is diuersly vnderstood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneua Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbine, Cedar; the Seuentie, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will haue it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worne at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his couenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Ægypt it was the vse to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes eate not; and he auoweth, that he saw in Vtica, in the Temple of Apollo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kind of wood was not subiect to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete sauour, lasting also better then any other wood, & because neere the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedars trees, as also in all the mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Pererius conceiueth, that the Arke had diuers sorts of Timber, and that the bottome had of one sort, the decke and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines: thereby to seuer the cleane beasts from the vncleane, and to preserue their seuerall sorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, hee cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it Plin. l.16.c.40. V.18.

without the helpe of a Compas, or the North ſtarre. The Pitch which Noah vſed, is by ſome ſuppoſed to haue beene a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorra, now the dead Sea, or Aſphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the Weſt India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Waxe.

Pererius.

That the Arke was of ſufficient capacitie.

THe Arke, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cubites, fiftie of bredth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion, it had ſixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. AVGVSTINE: Proculdubio figura eſt peregrinantis in hoc ſeculo Ciuitatis Dei, (hoc eſt) Eccleſiæ, quæ fit ſalua per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Chriſtus Ieſus; nam & menſura ipſa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudiniſq; eius ſignificat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines pranunciatus eſt venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (ſayth he) it is a figure of the Citie of God, trauailing in this World as a ſtranger (that is) of the Church, ſaued by the Tree whereupon the Mediator betweene God and Man, the Man Ieſus Chriſt did hang: for euen the very meaſure of the length, height, and bredth, anſwereth the ſhape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the comming of Chriſt was fore-told and performed.

De Ciuit. Dei, l. 15. c. 26.

By what kind of Cubite the Arke was meaſured, it hath beene a diſputed queſtion among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect theſe: The firſt kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, meaſured from the ſharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The ſecond (the Palme-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Perſian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three ynches. The fourth is the ſacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Laſtly, there is a fift Cubit, called Geometricall, which containeth ſixe common Cubits. But of all theſe ſorts, which were commonly meaſured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens ſtatures hath made the difference. For as there is now a leſſe proportion of bodies, ſo is the common Cubit, from the ſharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of leſſe length then it was in elder times.

S. Auguſtine conſidering the many ſorts of Beaſts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was ſometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometricall Cubit, which contayneth almoſt ſixe of the Common: For meaſuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacitie of that Veſſell built by Hiero of Syracuſe, or the Ship of Ptolomie Philo-pater. But S. Auguſtine (who at the firſt was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometricall Cubit; and found, vpon better conſideration, that there needed not ſo huge a Body to preſerue all ſorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reſerued. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fiſhes into the Arke, becauſe they were kept liuing (ſaith S. Auguſtine) in their owne element. Non fuit neceſſe conſeruare in Arca quæ poſſent in aquis viuere; non ſolùm merſa ſicut Piſces, verum ſuper-natantia, ſicut multa alites: It was not needfull to conſerue thoſe Creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the Waters; and not onely Fiſhes which can liue vnder water, but alſo thoſe Fowles which ſit and ſwim on them. And againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia ADAM non huius, ſed illius fructum vetitum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters, which God curſed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did ADAM eat. So as S. Auguſtine gathereth hereupon (as aforeſaid) that ſo huge a Frame needed not.

And if we looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, we ſhall finde nothing monſtrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the moſt part) haue more of miſchiefe and of ignorance, then of any reuerend reaſon, finde many impoſſibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifeſt, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now ſeeme differing, and of ſeuerall kindes, were not then in rerum natura. For thoſe Beaſts which are of mixt natures, eyther they were not in that age, or elſe it was not needfull to preſerue them, ſeeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyæna's, and the like; the one begotten by Aſſes and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolues. And whereas by diſcouering of ſtrange Lands, wherein there are found diuers Beaſts and Birds differing in colour or ſtature from thoſe of theſe Northerne parts, it may be ſuppoſed by a ſuperficiall conſideration, that all thoſe which weare red and pyed Skinnes, or Feathers, are differing from thoſe that are leſſe painted, and were plaine ruſſet or blacke; they are much miſtaken that ſo thinke. And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but onely in magnitude, betweene the Cat of Europe, and the Ownce of India; and euen thoſe Dogges which are become wilde in Hiſpagniola, with which the Spaniards vſed to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolues, and begin to deſtroy the breed of their Cattell, and doe alſo oftentimes teare aſunder their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drown'd and low Iſlands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thruſh hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fiſh of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which wee call the Blacke-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but ſome kind of ſtrange Beaſts: and ſo the Giants of the South America ſhould be of another kind, then the people of this part of the World. We alſo ſee it dayly, that the natures of Fruits are changed by tranſplantation, ſome to better, ſome to worſe, eſpecially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the beſt Melons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcummers, by being ſet in a barren Soyle. Therefore taking the kindes preciſely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the meaſure of the common Cubit, was ſufficiently capacious to contayne of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of meaſure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly ſtature (and leſſe allowance we cannot giue to the difference betweene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in bredth, and 60. foot deepe. Acoſt. hiſt. India.

But firſt of all, to make it manifeſt that the Geometricall Cubit is not vſed in the Scripture, the ſtature of the Giants therein named may ſuffice. For if the Bed of Og, King of Baſan, had beene nine Geometricall Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliah, who had the length of ſix Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if theſe Cubites had beene Geometricall, then had beene 54. foot in height, and vpwards, which were monſtrous and moſt incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliah beene nine foot long, and farre waightier and bigger then all Dauids bodie, who carried it away. Deut. 3. 11. 1. Sam. 17. 4.

Againe, if the Geometricall Cubit had beene vſed for a Meaſure in the Scripture, as many Commenters haue obſerued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe fiue Cubites of length, fiue of bredth, and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot vpright, and ſo muſt their Prieſts haue aſcended by ſteps or Ladders to haue performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement, giuen in theſe words: Thou ſhalt not goe vp with ſteppes vnto mine Altar, that thy ſhame be not diſcouered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubites high, which make foure foot, that their Prieſts ſtanding thereby might execute their Office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometricall, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the meaſure of Giantly ſtature; which meaſure (doubtleſſe) might giue much the more capacitie to the Arke, although it be alſo probable, that as the Men were, ſo were the Horſes whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correſpondent ſize. And yet (as I take it) though by this meanes there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the diſtinct Species of Animals, whoſe liues cannot be preſerued in the Waters, might according to their preſent quantities be contained in a Veſſell of thoſe dimenſions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vſuall meaſure: whence it followeth of neceſſitie, that thoſe large Bodyes which were in the dayes of Noah might haue roome ſufficient in the Arke, which was meaſured by a Cubit of length proportionable. Exod. 20. 26.

How the appointed number of creatures to be ſaued, (that is) ſeuen of the cleane, two of the vncleane (with neceſſarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, Butao hath very learlearnedly declared: the briefe ſumme of whoſe diſcourſe to that purpoſe, is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubits, which multiplyed by the bredth, namely fiftie Cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubits, ſheweth the whole Concauitie to haue beene 450000. Now whereas the poſts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may ſeeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the roofe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cubicall Cubes, was a ſufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of ſuch greatneſſe we ſeeke roome for 89. diſtinct Species of Beaſts, or (leſt any ſhould be omitted) for 100. ſeuerall kinds, we ſhall eaſily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bigneſſe are no way anſwerable to them, and for meat to ſuſtaine them all. For there are three ſorts of Beaſts, whoſe bodies are of a quantitie beſt knowne; the Beefe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the reſt may be reduced, by ſaying, (according to Ariſtotle) that one Elephant is anſwerable to foure Beeues, one Lyon to two Wolues, and ſo of the reſt. Of Beaſts, ſome feede on vegetables, others on fleſh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater ſort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the Law of Moſes, whereof ſeuen of a kind entred into the Arke, namely, three couples for breede, and one odde one for ſacrifice: the other eight and twentie kindes were taken by two of each kinde, ſo that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great Beaſts cleane, and ſix and fiftie vncleane, eſtimable for largeneſſe as ninetie one Beeues; yet for a ſupplement (leſt perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as a hundred and twentie Beeues. Of the leſſer ſort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke ſixe and twentie kinds, eſtimable with good allowance for ſupply, as foureſcore Sheepe. Of thoſe which deuoure fleſh were two and thirtie kinds, anſwerable to threeſcore and foure Wolues. All theſe two hundred and eightie Beaſts might be kept in one ſtorie or roome of the Arke, in their ſeuerall Cabbines; their Meat in a ſecond: the Birds and their prouiſion in a third, with place to ſpare for Noah and his family, and all their neceſſaries.

†. I.

A preterition of ſome queſtions leſſe materiall: with a note of the vſe of this queſtion, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHat time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to diſpute: but he receiued the Commandement from God a hundred yeeres before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leyſure ſufficient. As for the number of Deckes and Partitions, which Origen diuides into foure, S. Auguſtine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuerſie: or whether thoſe creatures which ſometimes reſt on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horſes, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needleſſe curioſitie; and yet to this fayth Pererius, and others before him, that a Fiſh-poole might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuſe. Laſtly, to conſider or labour to diſproue the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who ſuppoſe that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windores of Cryſtall to receiue in Light, and keepe out Water, were but to reuiue the buried vanities of former times. But that which I ſeeke moſt to ſatisfie my ſelfe and others in, is in what part of the World the Arke reſted after the Floud: becauſe the true vnderſtanding of ſome of theſe places (as the Seat of the terreſtriall Paradiſe, and the reſting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Floud; and all ſtorie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderſtood.

†. II.

A propoſall of the common opinion, that the Arke reſted vpon ſome of the Hils of Armenia.

AND firſt, for the true place where the Arke reſted after the Floud, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah trauailed to their firſt ſettlement and plan-plantation, I am resolued (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were vtterly mistaken. And I am not led so to think out of my Humour or newnesse of opinion, or singularitie; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke, ſtaied vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hils Gordai or Gordiæi in Armenia the greater (as the words Gordæi and Kardu seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus cals this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontorie in Arabia felix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Ptolomie cals Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to bee one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Gordiæi, and Curtius Cordæi: Ptolomie Gordæi and Gordiæi: of which the Countrie next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Nimada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is vsed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Arminea seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordiæi or Gordeni. The mountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Thospitis: whence the Riuer of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordiæi (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius cals Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus; which name (saith Iunius) was of the euent; because of Noahs comming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed euent; seeing any hil, from whence on euery side we must descend, may thus be called: as Iunius corrects the place in Iosephus ἀποβατήριον (Kuharis.) That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Iosep. l. 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called ἀποβατήριον (as it were the descent or comming downe) and Epiphan. l. 1. contr. Hæres. cals it Λίβας: which word in the Armenian and Ægyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to bee deriued; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Ægyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath beene embraced from age to age, receiuing a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly bee giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the rest adioyning.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

BVt there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiæan mountaines.

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeere, or in the yeere 131. after the flouds, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chush, and Chaldea. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue spent so many yeeres in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interiacent, which might by easie iourneies haue beene past ouer in twentie dayes; and to hasten and helpe which passage the nauigable riuer of Tigris offered itselfe, which is euery where transpassable by boates of great burden: so as where the Desart on the one side resisted their expedition, the riuer on the contrary side serued to aduance it; the riuer rising out of the same Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second floud (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it soundeth ill to the eare of reason, that they would haue spent many yeeres in that low and ouerflowne Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Riuers which imbroyder or compasse it: for the effects witnessed their affections, and the workes, which they vndertooke, their vnbeliefe; being no sooner arriued in Shinar, but they began to prouide themselues of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the first known Citie of the world founded after the floud, about 131. yeres, or (as others suppose) ten yeeres later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they vndertooke that worke in two respects, first, to make themselues famous, To get vs a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vsurpe dominion ouer the rest.

†. IIII.

The second argument, That the Easterne people were most ancient in populositie, and in all humane glory.

FOr a second Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight then any thing which hath beene, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vse of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade vs, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of Batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make vs now to vnderstand, That the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonij Tianai. l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expresst in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell betweene Hyphasis and Ganges, vse not themselues to goe forth into battaile: but that they driue away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Iupiter. By which meanes there it is said, that Hercules Ægyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the inuention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because hee brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and sauage) had reason to giue him the honour, from whome they receiued the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no lesse ancient then Seth or Henoch were: for they are said to haue written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the floud. But from the Easterne world it was that Iohn Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gerson a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this mysterie was then supposed to be but newly borne, the Chinaos had letters long before either the Ægyptians or Phœnicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuil knowledge, or any letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnessed, who about an hundred yeeres since discouered those Kingdomes, and doe now enioy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaos account all other Nations but Saluages, in respect of themselues.

And to adde strength to this argument, the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may iustly be called to witnesse, who found more Cities and sumptuositie in that little Kingdome of Porus, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other trauails & vndertakings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not trauailed so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-rising, and heare Paulus Venetus what hee reporteth of the vttermost Angle and Iland thereof, wee shall finde that those Nations haue sent out, and not receiued, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more sauage.

And of the Isle of Iapan (now Zipingari) Venetus maketh this report: Incolæ religioni, literis, & sapientiæ sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: vnum cognoscunt Principem, vnum Deum adorant. The Ilanders are exceedingly addicted to religoin, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they vse in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowldge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuilitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernment, is reported to be such by those who haue beene employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and deuers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMIRAMIS found in the East Indies.

BVt for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader: who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more then three Millions to inuade India, to which hee adioyned also 500000. Horse, and 100000. Waggons: whereof if wee beleeue but a third part, it shall suffice to proue that India was the first planted and peopled Countrie after the floud. Now as touching the time wherein shee liued: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most approued Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betweene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whom shee encountred in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witnesse of Diod. Siculus. STAVROBATES, auitis maioribus quàm quæ erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs. STAVROBATES gathering together greater troupes then those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had beene encreased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance (this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Staurobates must haue been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow vp in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall bee demonstrated hereafter in the Storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication naturall, produce so many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Armie victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had beene so late as Babel ouerturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if wee allow 65. yeeres time after the Floud, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cush ere hee begat Seba, after whom hee had Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: Gen. 10. 7. and then thirtie yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and fiue yeeres to his fiue elder brothers, which make sixtie fiue, and then twice thirtie yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all an hundred twenty fiue yeeres, there will then remaine sixe yeeres to haue beene spent in trauailing from the East, ere they arriued in Shinar in the yeere after the Floud 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might bee of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to haue arriued at Shinaar in the yeere 101.: and the confusion to haue beene at Pelegs birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build Nimrods Towre in the Ayre; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require sound foundations) in the Plaines of Shinaar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could bee no confusion in that yeere 101. or at Pelegs birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vsurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere after the Floud, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted forty yeeres (according to GLICAS) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus, Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it fals out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Floud, ere a Colonie was sent into East Indea; which granted (the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly be beleeued, that Staurobates could haue exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Empresse of all that part of the world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument from diuers considerations in the persons of NOAH.

FOurthly, it is no way propable, that Noah, who knew the world before the floud, and had liued therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the floud, without any certaine habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrot was but the conducter of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabite that middle part of the earth and the Westerne world; (which trauailes Noah put ouer to yong and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then couered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range ouer so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia fœlix, where hee should (if the tradition be sound) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spaine, where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his sonnes wiues: from thence into Italie, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Ægypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they say hee banisht him out of Italie. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Grœcian fables. For let euery reasonable man conceiue, what it was to trauaile farre in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flond, the same lay waste and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bushes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, prouing that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue vndertaken that vnbeleeuing presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preualent perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authority which he receiued euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoeuer they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority ouer his children and people. Certainely, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankinde was by themselues purchased through cruletie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probabilitie, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that hee sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nauclerus and Cœlestinus take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Ioctan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Ioctan of Sem, and Suphene of Iaphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I wil not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Ioctan, Hauilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning adioyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Vr, till hee was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Ioctan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowen. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moues me to beleeue, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankinde, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested apart with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heauenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where he planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thankes-giuing to God by sacrifice, he is not remembred in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

†. VII.

Of the senseless opinion of ANNIVS the Commentor vpon BEROSVS: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested; as the Caspian and Gordiean hils which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some place of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments & authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruailously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Caspij; which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Gordiai, hee hath no other shift to vnite these opinions, but by vniting those farre-distant mountaines together. To effect which, he hath found no other inuention, then to charge those men with errour, which haue carefully ouerseene, printed, and published Ptolimies Geographie, in which they are altogether disseuered. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills fiue degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainely, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanouanus and others, we shall finde nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in those the mountaines Caspij stand seuen degrees to the East of the Cordiai, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authoritie Annius strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giueth this iudgment vpon the them in the like dispute. Aberrârunt verò omnes, non negligentiâ sed regnorum situs ignorantia, They haue all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to proue the same hee citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeeres before Ninus, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia the flocke of mortall men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembred (who were so called, because saued from Deucalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex hijs venisse IANVM cum DYRIM & Gallis progenitoribus Vmbrorum, From these Scythians, he saith, that IANVS came with DYRIM and with with the Gilli the progenitours of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythis tribuitur, Certainely, the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway giuen to the Scythians. And herein truely I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Vmbri which long since inhabited Italie, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabite that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he faineth a nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great floud, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part vtterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga mankind was restored, he therefore in the Proœme of his Commentarie vpon Berosus, leaueth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia saluates. For Scythia Saga or Sacæ, is vndoubtedly vnder the Mountaynes of Paropanisus, on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground; and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best authoritie which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where hee hath read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scytha Rege eorum, from Scytha their King. But (in a word) wee may see his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his falshood in citing this place. For Diodorus a most approoued and diligent Author beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythæ, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula, The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doth directly delineate Scythia Saga or Sacæ, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Sacæ which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Sacæ (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that name. Now that any nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleeueth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Sacæ; and the Countrie about Araxes Ptolomie calleth Colthene and Soducene and Sacapene without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imatus or without, to the number of 100. seuerall Nations are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

Tab. Asiæ. 7. & 8

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some haue written, others haue seene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountaines is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, vsque ostia Oxeamnii in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc vsq; ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus is that part of the World, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaan Mountaines: on the North by vnknowne Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Rha now Wolga.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ magna sanè Regio est, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur) Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations (saith Niger) much of it being betweene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he disseuereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leaueth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nations; neyther doth his fellow Frier Iohn Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neyther doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the bloud of those Kings (though afterward a Monke) euer acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Mathias a Michon (a Canon of Cracouia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that trauailed a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Trauailes are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disprouing many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others he buricth that ancient and receiued opinion; That out of the Mountaines Riphæi, and Hyperborei in Scythia, ſpring the Riuers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; prouing by vnanſwerable experience, that there are no ſuch Mountaines in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountaines of thoſe famous Riuers are now by the Trade of Muſcouia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they ariſe out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and mariſh grounds. The Riuer of Tanais or Don, ariſeth to the South of the Citie Tulla, ſome twentie Engliſh miles, out of a Lake called Iwanoweſero, in the great Wood Okenitzkilies or Iepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riſeth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Riuers flow of Borysthenes (now Neyper) and Dſuina or Diuidna. And this learned Polonian doth in this ſort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Ruſsians, Lithuanians, Muſcouians, and thoſe adioyning, bounded on the Weſt by the Riuer of Viſſa, the Name perchance miſ-printed Viſſa for Viſtula, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia: and for the Eaſt border he nameth Tanais or Don. Sarmatia Aſiatica he curteth from Europe by the ſame Riuer of Tanais, and the Caſpian Sea, to with-hold it from ſtretching farther Eaſt: this Aſian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the ſame Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Aſiatica it ſelfe aboue three hundred and a few odde yeers before his owne time: theſe be his words: Conſtat eam eſſe gentem nouam, & aduentitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis ſedibus) paulò plus abhinc trecentis annis Aſiæ Sarmatiam ingreſſam: It is manifeſt (ſaith he, ſpeaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coaſts of the Eaſt: from whence they entred into Aſia, and gat new ſeates a litle more then 300. yeeres ſince: For (indeed) before that time the Gothes or Pouloci inhabited Sarmatia, Aſiatica. And this Mathias liued in the yeare 1511. and this his Diſcourſe of Sarmatia was printed at Auguſta in the yeare 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witneſſeth. Now theſe Scythians (ſaith he) came from the Eaſt, for in the Eaſt it was that the Arke of Noah reſted; and the Scythæ Sacæ were thoſe people which liued at the North foot of thoſe Mountaines of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe themſelues with the great Imaus. And were there no other teſtimony then the generall deſcription of the Earth now extant, and the witneſſe of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betweene all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only thoſe three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caſpian Sea: on the Eaſt ſhore of which Sea, but not one the Weſt, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariacæ) betweene Iaxartus and Iactus; but what are theſe Scythians to any Ariacæ, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

The fift Argument, The Vine muſt grow naturally neere the place where the Arke reſted.

TO this if we adde the conſideration of this part of the Text, That NOAH planted a Vineyard, we ſhall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rayſin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this reſting of the Arke was ſuppoſed: for if the Vine was a ſtranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Tyrrhenus firſt brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at ſuch as Brennus and the Gaules inuaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gaules remained betweene the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, neere vnto the Senones, where the continued a long time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was firſt brought them out of Italie; and after they taſted thereof they haſted to inhabite that Countrey, which brought forth ſuch pleaſant fruit: ſo as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from elſe where into Italie.

Gen. 9. 20.

Seruius Aeneid. Eutropius.

Now it is manifeſt, that Noah trauailed not farre to ſeeke out the Vine. For the Plantation therof is remembred, before there was any counſaile how to diſpoſe of the World among his children: and the firſt thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vinyard, after the Sacrifice and Thankeſgiuing to God; and whereſoeuer the Arke reſted, there there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare, that he trauailed farre: for the Scriptures teach vs, that he was a Husbandman, & not a Wanderer.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appeare, sauing that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they haue this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem ædificarunt, altissimam, quasi per eam cœlum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens,

†. X.

An answere to the obiection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the heighth of the Hils there.

BVt before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may bee found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath onely these words: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the marginal note of the Geneua, the Chaldean Paraphrast cals it Kardu; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to bee a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the heighth (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sate thereon.

Gen. 8. 14.

Epiph. l. 1. contra Hæres.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Mountaines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncouered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, wee might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Fould. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountaines, and to prooue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Cælenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same discription shee maketh mention of Marsyas, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Mæander, which is farre from the Gordiæan Mountaines in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in IOSEPHVS (though out of BEROSVS, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that IOSEPHVS sets Ararat betweene ARMENIA and PARTHIA, toward ADIABENE, and affirmeth withall, that in the prouince of Cæron by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserued some pieces of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betweene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discouerie of the Mountaines Cordiæi was first borrowed out of Berosus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berosus, differs far from the wordes of that Berosus, which wandreth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Annius. For Berosus cited by Iosephus, hath these words: Fertur & nauigij huius pars in Armenia apud montem Cordiæorum superesse, & quosdam bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci huius homines vti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia vpon the Cordiæan Mountaines; and that diuers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they vse it in stead of an amulet. But Annius his

Edition

Edition of the Fragment of Beroſus vſeth theſe wordes: Nam elenata ab aquis in Gordia montis vertice quieuit, cuius adhuc dicitur aliqua pars eſſe, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maxime vtuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted vp by the waters, reſted on the top of the Gordiean Mountaines, of which it is reported that ſome parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: ſo as in theſe two Texts (beſides the difference of wordes) the name is diuerſly written. The ancient Beroſus writes Cordiei with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordiei with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vſed for a preſeruatiue againſt Poyſon or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice; And if it be ſaid that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approued Anthour: for one of them vſeth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that ſo it is reported, the other, that ſo it is ſayd; and both but by heare-ſay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is ſo infamous an Hiſtorian, as wiſe men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receiue from it.

Furthermore, theſe Mountaines which Ptolomie cals Gordiei, are not thoſe Mountaines which himſelfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Moſchici. Theſe be his owne wordes: Montes Armeniæ nominantur ij, qui Moſchici appellantur, qui protenduntur vſq; ad ſuperiacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moſchici, ſtretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: alſo the Hill which is called Paryardes; which Mountaines Plinie calleth Pariedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordiei or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordiean Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northermoſt of which did the Georgians take their names, who were firſt Gordians and then Georgians, who amidſt all the ſtrength of the greateſt Infidels of Perſia and Turkie, doe ſtill remaine Chriſtians. Concerning the other ſuppoſitions, that the Mountaines of Gordiei, otherwiſe Baris Kardu or Lubar, (which Ptolomie calleth Torgodiaion) are the higheſt of the World, the ſame is abſolutly falſe.

Of Caucaſus, and diuers farre higher hils then the Armenian.

FOr the beſt Coſmographers with other, that haue ſeene the Mountaines of Armenia, find them farre inferiour, and vnder-ſet to diuers other Mountaines euen in that part of the World, and elſe where: as the Mountaine Athos betweene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomie cals Olympus, now called Lacas, (ſaith Caſtaldus) is farre ſurmounting any Mountaine that euer hath beene ſeene in Armenia: for it caſteth ſhade three hundred furlongs, which is ſeuen and thirtie miles and vpwards: of whch Plutarch: Athos adumbrat latera Lemnia bouis: Athos ſhadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Alſo the Mount of Olympus in Theſſalie, is ſaid to be of that heighth, as neither the Windes, Cloudes or Raine ouertop it. Againe, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Myſia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is alſo of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may be ſeene from Conſtantinople. There are alſo in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERODOTVS: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita ſublimis eſſe dicitur, vt ad illius verticem oculi mortalium peruenire non poſſint: Vpon this Coaſt there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whoſe heighth is ſayd to be ſuch, as the eye of no mortall man can diſcerne the top thereof. And if we may beleeue Ariſtotle, then are all theſe inferiour to Caucaſus, which he maketh the moſt notorious both for breath and heighth: Caucaſus Mons omnium maximus, qui aſtinum ad ortum ſunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cuius iuga a Sole radiantur vſq; ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occaſu; Caucaſus (ſaith ARISTOTLE) is the greateſt Mountaine both for breadth and heighth of all thoſe in the North-eaſt, whoſe tops are lightned by the Sun-beames, vſq; ad conticinium (which is ſaith Macrobius) betweene the firſt crowing after mid-night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleeue eyther: for the higheſt Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Weſtward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes company at any ſuch late hours, Beſides theſe Mountaines which Ariſtotle calleth Caucaſi, are thoſe which ſeparate Colchis from Iberia;

Plut. Muſt. Coſm.

Ariſt. Met. cap. l. 1. c. 13.

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for hee acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phasis riseth in the same Mountayne, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hils which sunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which Riuer (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoeuer Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities if in this Storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was; for the Bookes of the Sybils set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the higheſt Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the essertion and supposition haue equall credit: for there are many Hils which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the higheſt.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (sayth Hierome) signifieth high Towres: and so may all high Hils be called indifferently; and therefore we may better giue the the name of Baris to the Hils of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hils of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are vndoubtedly the higheſt of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselues doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiei stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiean, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hils which disioyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaile that the same Ledge of Hils running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and euen in India be called Ararat.

LAstly, wee must blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else wee must digge it downe, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Shinaar: or else we shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to euery eye, we must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spaine is the Pyrenian; but as these being continuations of many Hils keepe one name in diuers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caspij Moschici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diuersly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie cals by one name Caucasus, lying betweene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those maruailous Mountaines of Imaus stretch themselues North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hils Taurus, and Moses the hils of Ararat. The reason of seuerall names giuen by Ptolomie was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disseuer; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: hauing uing all these Kingdomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles, as they seuer and diuide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which sunder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the lesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Prouince of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Though Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates forceth her passage, leauing the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her West banke; and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the Riuer of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselues Coatras, though betweene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselues Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the Riuer of Bagradus riseth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselues into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the Reuer Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now neere their wayes end, they first make themselues the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus; and lastly of Caucasia, euen were the famous Riuer of Indus with his principall companions Hydaspis and Zaradrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselues exceeding high, to equall the strong Hils called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomie) thatis, betweene Paroponisus and Imaus: and improperly, betweene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus. Ptol. lib. Asia.

† XIIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile

NOw in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and Riuer Ianus, and the Mountaine Nyseus (so called of Bacchus Niseus or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceiue that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Floud: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approued. In his Indoscythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantasticall opinions of this subiect. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Iudea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these Mountaines, Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land by Moses direction found bunches of equal bignes at Escol. Numq 13.24.

The fruitfulnesse of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hils, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate Wine of all other.

† XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also trauerse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name

L. 5. c. 27. name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high Hils, euen from Cilica to Paropanisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus; and as the Hils of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betweene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hils for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gaue them; the diuersitie of appellations no otherwise growing, then by their diuiding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it washeth the Coasts of Carthage, and ouer against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betweene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum, betweene Athens and Asia, Ægeum: betweene Sestus and Abydus, Hellespont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Deucaledonycum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, euen to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction then the words beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plaine (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconuenience or contrarietie) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selues any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolue our selues, that euery word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Booke. And therefore wee must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of CHRIST IESVS (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Euangelio legerit, quàm si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio in corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which he readeth in the Gospel (the Disciples of Christ hauing written it) then if he had seene the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his owne body, setting it downe.

Gen. c. 11. v. 2. (The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode; which proueth without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For wee must remember, that in all places whersoeuer Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Ioctan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And CAIN Gen. 10. 30. dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents Gen. 4. 16. and Habitations of Abraham after hee departed from Sechem, hee vseth these wordes: Gen. 12. 8. Afterwards remouing thence vnto a Mountaine Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: hauing Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written. And ABRAHAM went forth iourneying towards the South: Ezech. 38. 6. also when Ezechiel prophecied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that she came Matth. 12. 42. from the South to visit SALOMON: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer Matth. 2. v. 1. presents vnto Christ. And that all Regions, and these trauailes were precisely set downe vpon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Iudæa, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Cælesyrians the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this discription of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arriue in that Vally of Babylonia, is not a iournying from the East, nor so neere vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto cælo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrionall, and the North part thereof in forty fiue; and those Gordiæan Mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are situated in thirtie fiue, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betweene East and West) the Gordiæan Mountaines stand in 71. degrees, and the Valley of Shinaar in 79 and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar Northwest, ninetie fiue degrees from the East; and if Armenia had beene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compasse. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs, In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for euery speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are repleniſhed with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleeue Writers (of little authority) who also speake by heare say and by report, vt fertur, & vt dicitur, as Berosius and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all ad-uenture. But this is infallible true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the floud; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, which had Noah himselfe for an Instructer: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which ouer-topped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountaines of Ararat, and not on those Mountaines of the Northwest, as Berosus first fained, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, where hee planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground and liued thereon. Placuit vero NOACHO agriculturæ studium, in quatractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamq, rem sua ipsius lingua ISH-ADAMATH (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratusq, est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOAH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that NOAH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also shewth that he was no Wanderer: and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preserue him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the floud; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was repeopled.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder then IAPHET.

OF these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. S. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the yongest: and herein the oppinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue, as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Iacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneua, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these wordes: Vnto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SHEM also the Father of all the Sons of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET, the eldest sonne were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it beene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainely vnderstood without any danger or incopuenince, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the fiue hundreth yeere of his life, begate the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the sixe hundreth yeere (to wit) the hundreth yeere following, came the generall floud; two yeeres after

Gen. 11. 10. which Shem begate Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeeres old, two yeeres after the floud: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeeres old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeeres old at the floud, and in the sixe hundreth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which seeing the Scriptures before re-
Gen. 11. v. 24. membred hath denyed him, and that it is also written: Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his yonger sonne had done vnto him (to wit) HAM; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This yonger sonne so conuerted by the vulgar and Geneua, Iunius turnes it filius minimus; His yongest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to bee the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the yongest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he
In Gen. derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminencie of his birth, as Esau and Reuben did. Pererius conceiueth that Ham was called the yonger in respect of Shem the eldest, but auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of yonger and yongest, because it wanteth the comparatiue degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Sauiour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneua, who agree in this conuersion, SHEM Frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremelius, SHEM fratri IAPHET maioris; or with Pererius, SHEM frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the floud did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scrip-
Gen. 11. v. 10. tures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that SHEM was an hundred yeeres old, and begat ARPHAXAD two yeeres after the floud; and againe in the 12. Verse: So SHELA liued after he begat EBAR, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of fiue yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres were alwayes precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of diuers things that all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yeeld to MOSES: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of HAM.

BVt let vs go vnto the Worlds plantation after the floud, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall find that many Nations haue supposed or fayned themselues those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the sonnes and issues of Noah wete distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receiue allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoeuer, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath beene beene borrowed thence, and therefore latter then it, as all carefull obſeruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Euſebius in the Præme of his Chronologie: MOSES is found more ancient then all thoſe whom the Grecians make moſt ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Traian warre; and farre before HERCVLES, MVSÆVS, LINVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLVX, ÆSCVLAPIVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the reſt of the gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue ſeated in the top and higheſt Turret of their Diuinitie.

For of the three Iupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancienteſt was the ſonne of Æther, whoſe three ſonnes begotten on Proſerpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the firſt King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moſes bring the children of Iſrael out of Ægypt: Eduxit MOSES populum Dei ex Ægypto nouiſſimo tempore CECROPIS Athenienſis Regis; MOSES brought the children of Iſrael out of Ægypt, in the laſt dayes of CECROPS, King of the Athenians, ſaith S. Auguſtine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it ſelfe, but Theſeus long after him. But becauſe the truth hereof is diuerſly prooued, and by many learned Authors, I will nor cut aſunder the purpoſe in hand, by alleaging many authorities in a needleſſe queſtion, but leaue it to the proper place.

First, we are to conſider, that the world after the Floud not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinaar, to the vttermoſt border of Europe, Africa and Aſia in haſte, but that theſe children were directed by a wiſe Father, who knew thoſe parts of the world before the Floud, to which he diſpoſed his children after it, and ſent them not as Diſcouerers, or at all-aduenture, but aſſigned and alloted to euery Sonne and their iſſues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Authours, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Auguſtus in the fiction of Æneas) or elſe to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build heerein vpon the Scriptures themſelues, and after them vpon Reaſon and Nature. Firſt therefore wee muſt call to minde and conſider, what manner of face the earth euery-where had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing thoſe fruitfulleſt Vallies, with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our ſelues thereby, what wonderfull Deſarts, what impaſſable faſtneſſe of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten graſſe, what Lakes and ſtanding Pooles, and what Mariſhes, Fens, and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaines) was peſtered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and deſtroying Winter depreſſeth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect) yet in twenty or thirtie yeres, theſe our grounds would not all ouer-grow and be couered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods, or with other offenſiue Thickets and Buſhments: much more did all ſorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, proſper in the moſt fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long & warme Summer, and hauing withall the ſtart of 130. yeeres, to raiſe themſelues without controlement.

This being conſidered, it will appeare, that all theſe people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whom Nimrod either by order or ſtrength tooke the Dominion, did after the confuſion of Languages, and at ſuch time as they grew to be a mighty People, diſperſe themſelues into the Regions adioyning to the ſaid Vallie of Shinaar, which contained the beſt part of Meſopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldæa; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: ſome of them towardes the South, others towards the Weſt and North. And although there were alloted to Shem many Regions, both Eaſt and Weſt from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Paleſtina, which the Canaanites firſt poſſeſt; yet could he not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the ſuddaine, but by time and degrees. For wee finde, that Abraham the true ſucceſſour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Vr; and from thence (called by God) hee rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare hee trauailed to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neyther of themselues) seuen Descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea, where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeares; and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Niniue. Indeed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can know) were, in that Age of the Issues of Ham, the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking lesse effect, vntill diuers yeares were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisedome of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Ægypt, for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in IAPHETS portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie seating GOMER the sonne of IAPHET in Italie; and another of IAPHETS sonnes TVBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of Longinque Nauigation.

NOw beginne therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Iles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iaphets sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the diuision were made at Phalegs birth) in the yeare of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeare after the Floud one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iaphet were the Iles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands adioyning; and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Ægeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut is off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southwest, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cycladës or Iles lying betweene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Iles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young-ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which hee held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilatet Deus IAPHETH; Let God spread abroade (or increase the Posteritie of) IAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of SHEM. For though Iunius heere vseth the word (alliciat) and not dilatet: and the Geneua persuadeat; yet the Septuagint haue dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his Seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories; but that thereby they should bee made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iaphets sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if wee may beleeue Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth yeare of Nimrods Reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italie: which also Functius confirmeth in these words Anno decimo NIMRODI, &c. In the tenth yeare of NIMRODS Reigne, GOMERVS GALLVS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeare of the same NIMRODS Reigne TVBAL seated himselfe in Austuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeares after the Floud, according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselues, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the heighth and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre was almost builded the Scriptures witnesse: But the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Towre, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Bricke to such a Worke, of the greatest heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was. For where the vniuersall Floud couered the highest Mountaines fifteene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Towre (saith NIMROD) whose top may reach vnto the Heauen: meaning, that they would rayse their Worke aboue fifteene Cubits higher then the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselues from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with Waters of all the World: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approoued also by the Prophet Hieremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a rayssed building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycas vpon Genesis giueth fortie yeares. For it seemeth, that the Towre was neere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may bee gathered (because the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Worke of their supposed defence, which was the Towre: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to bee noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Towre was throwne downe) these Nations did not disperse themselues: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceiued not one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newnesse of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeares; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeare could creepe through 3000. miles of Desart, with Women, Children, and Cattell: let those light Beleeuers, that neyther tye themselues to the Scripture, nor to reason, appproue it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeares in building, or but neere such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. yeares, it were more then foolishnesse and madnesse it selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Floud to the arriuall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeares, and whereof they had spent some part in trauailing from the East. Againe, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Worke 400. yeares (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plentie of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Towre of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeares remembred. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themselues how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wiues and Children, and Cattell, to trauaile 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Desarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeares then of a 100. dayes. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they haue not entred the Countrey ten miles in ten yeares. And if Nimrods people spent many yeares by the account before remembred in passing from the East India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance betweene those places containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the bodie of Biscay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Austuria or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke diuers yeares to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little aboue 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many yeares to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles to Countries lesse knowne vnto them by farre; then the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Floud: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembred; but what hee vnderstood of most part of the World else it is vnknowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth & twelfth of Nimrods

Gen. 11. Gen. 11. Plin.

Isai.1.66.v.8. rods Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at one? But it may be obiected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea, and so saue this great trauaile through Desarts by Land. But we neuer reade of any Nauigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people as we may iustly suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily beleeue, that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattell, by whose Milke they liued and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banquetting Dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselues by the Heards and numbers of their Cattell: who had Flockes of Sheepe, and great Droues and Heards of their owne, and their own Sheep-heards and Heardsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouergone Granado, Valentia, and other Prouinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibralter, disdayned all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and haue sought out the yron, woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Nauigation. But before the iourney of the Argonauta there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Iason had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and fiftie Passengers, yet it was farre greater then any of the former times: Erat enim antea paruarum nauicularum vsus: For in former times they vsed very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gaue themselues of olde to farre-off Nauigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the inuention of Ships vnto them:

Diod.Sicul.l.4. c.4.fol.115.

Tibull.Eleg.7. Strabo l.16.

Primaratem ventis credere docta Tyros,

Tyrus knew first how Ships might vse the Wind.

And for those Boates called longæ naues or Gallies, Plinie saith that Ægesias ascribeth the deuice to Paralus: and Philostephanus to Iason: Ctesias to Samyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Ægeon: to which inuention the Erythræi are said to haue added certaine numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to haue increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to haue brought them to foure Bankes: the Quinq. Remi first to haue beene vsed by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans serued themselues in the Punicke Warre. But these bee perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the deuising of these Gallies on Sesostris, though Semiramis vsed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the inuention; and yet Tertullian (on the contrarie) giues it to Minerua: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Ægyptians vsed to coast the Shores of the Read Sea vpon raffes, deuised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittans had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered ouer with Leather: of which kind I haue seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naues excorio circumsuta in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor:) of which Lucan the Poet:

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inſpiration was inſtructed in ſo many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Nauigation were firſt reuealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference betweene the Arke of Noah, and ſuch Ships as were for any long Nauigation. Yea, ancient Stories ſhew, that it was long after theſe times, ere any durſt preſume vpon any long Voyages to Sea at leaſt with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattell: as alſo common reaſon can tell vs, that euen now when this Arte is come to her perfection, ſuch Vioages are very troubleſome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or vſe of Ships fit for any long Nauigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had paſſed themſelues and their people by Sea; the exerciſe of Nauigation would not haue beene dead for ſo many hundred yeares after. Leauing therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men elſe to their fancies, who haue caſt Nations into Countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moſes and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioyned both Nature, Reaſon, Policie, and neceſſitie: and to the reſt, neither probabilitie, nor poſſibilitie.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tvbal, and Meshech, ſeated firſt about Aſia the leſſe, out of Ezechiel, Cap. 38. 39.

NOw although many Learned and Reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which alſo hath beene and is receiued: yet I hope I may be excuſed, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Mountanus was alſo in ſome things much miſtaken: and for Ioſephus as hee hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errours withall, ſo was he in this Plantation of the World very groſſe and fabulous, whereby both Euſebius, Hieroſolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his teſtimonies for currant, haue beene by him farre miſſe-led. But the better to conceiue what Regions of the World Gomer the firſt ſonne of Iaphet poſſeſt, as alſo Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: becauſe the Scriptures take moſt knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, ſaith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find moſt iudicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chiefe Conductor in their Attempts againſt Iſrael. For beſides the portions of Europe, and the North-eaſt parts of the greater Aſia, which Iapheths Iſſus poſſeſt, all Aſia the leſſe was peopled by them. And that thoſe of the Iſſue of Iapheth (whom Ezechiel ſpeakes of) were ſeated hereabout, it may beſt appeare, if we conſider the circumſtances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former Propheſie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel propheſieth of the vniting of the two Kingdomes of Iſrael and Iuda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie. c. 37. v. 19.

By which Propheſie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purpoſed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpoſe it is written; And David my Seruant ſhall bee King ouer them, and they ſhall haue one Sheepheard, (that is) they ſhall be vnited as they were in Dauids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel propheſieth againſt thoſe Nations, which ſhould ſeeke to impeach this Vnion, and diſturbe the people of Iſrael, whom God purpoſed to receiue to grace, and promiſed to reſtore. And ſo in the ſame Chapter are thoſe Nations coupled together, which infeſted the Iſraelites after their returne, and ſought to ſubiect them: all which were the Subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cœleſyrians, next bordering Paleſtina, or the holy Land, followed alſo by the reſt of the Nations of Aſia the leſſe, which lay North from Iudea. The words of Ezechiel are theſe: Sonne of man, ſet thy face againſt Gog, and againſt the Land of Magog, the chiefe Princes of Meshech (or Moloch and Tvbal: and afterward; Behold, I come againſt the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tvbal: and in the ſixth verſe; Gomer and all his Bands, and the Houſe of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing firſt deliuered c. 38. v. 2.

the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vaine assayle Israel. He ioyneth them together vnder their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Iuda, and how seated and ioyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierome) tectum or couering of a house: and Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (sayth hee) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the couering of the Deuill vnder humane forme. He addeth that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so hee taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So farre Pintus; at least in this not amisse, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation, with which agreeth this obseruation of Beroaldus. Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is vsed but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Heliaiedia) is neuer added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called eyther Magog, or according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 39. Chapter is made manifest: Behold I come against thee, Gog the chiefe Prince of MESHECH and TVBAL. This must needs bee meant by the Successours of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Iewes their Tributaries onely, but endeuoured by all meanes, and by all kind of violence to extinguish the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrewes profest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serue the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remayned but the very name, and dead Images. Saint Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike because they inuaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela deriues the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: other of a Region: others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Iunius, who sayes that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greeke Stories call Gyges: who in former time hauing slaine Candaules the Lydian, gaue his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Riuers of Hyllus, and Mœnander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after hee had subdued the Countrey about the Riuer Rhodius which runneth into the Hellespont, called the Promontorie Trapese after his owne name Gyges. These Opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Iunius. For Magog, saith hee, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyattes obtayned, and after him his Sonne Crœsus; who (as Iunius further notes) hauing mastred all those Regions as farre South as Libanus in that Border built the Citie Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Cœlesyria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of the Iewes.

Now that Magog is found in Cœlesyria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Cœlesyria habet Bambycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syris verò Magog. Cœlesyria hath in it Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Magog. Hee further telleth vs that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis called by the Greekes Derceto, was here worshipped, Lucian makes mention hereof, saying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yet hee expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if we may beleeue Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authours did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough bee that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subiect vnto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now I doe not condemne the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Iosephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also bee the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Cœlesyria and the North parts adioyning bee meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to bee denyed, that the Scythians in old times comming out of the Northeast wasted the better part of Asia the lesse, and posseſt Caleſyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Citie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Iudea; according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infeſted the Israelites were the Ptolomies Kings of Ægypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Succeſſours of Seleucus, the Succeſſour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinkes that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to haue beene called Bambyce, as we haue said, but also Edeſſa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name; now the known name is Allepo: for so Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This Citie had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most deteſted Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermayde Atergatis, or Atirgitis, according to Plinie, which the Greekes call Derceto. Lib. 4. cap. de bello Sacro.

If then we conferre the words of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirtie eight Chapter, wherein he ioyneth together Gog Meſech, and Tubal: and withall remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Iudea: with whom also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; wee may (as I conceiue) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northerne Nations in respect of Iudea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spaine, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Cœleſyria: and therefore that the opinions of Beroſus, Ioſephus, and whosoeuer else hath followed them therein are to be reiected. But if Ioſephus referre himselfe to later times, and thinke that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spaine (to wit, from that piece of Land betweene Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania: (most part possest by the Georgians) then is his iudgement of better allowance. For without any repugnancie of opinions, it may be granted, that in proceſse of time these people might from their first habitation passe into the Countries neere the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spaine.

Ioſephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Iuſtine) they passed into Spaine to search out the Mines of that Region: hauing belike vnderstood that it was a Southerly Countrie and Mountaynous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes liued altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonautes did visit them;

Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas ſcindit ſub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta miniſtrant:

The Calybes plough not their barren soyle
But vndermine high Hils for Iron Veines:
Changing the purchase of their endlesse toyle
For Marchandize, which their poore liues sustaynes.

But it is more probable, that Spaine was first peopled by the Africans, who had euer since an affection to returne thither, and to repeople it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawne to passe ouer the Streights into that Countrey; and after by the Moores who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeares, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, then that in the twelfth yeare of Nimrods Raigne, Tubal past into Spaine, and therein built Saint Vual: a poore Towne, and a poore deuice, God knowes. Certaine it is that we must finde Moſoch or Meſech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meſech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarma their Assistants. And that Meſech inhabited Asia, Funckius (though he followed Beroſus) confesseth, for these bee his words: MESACVS, qui à MOSE MESECH, priſcos Meſios ab Adula monte uſq; ad Ponticam regionem poſuit: hæc regio poſtea Cappadocia dicta eſt, in qua urbs Mazica, &c. hæc eſt terra MAGOG principalis MESACVS, whom MOSES calleth MESECH, placed the ancient

Meſians

Meſians from the Mount Adulas, vnto the Coaſt of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Country of MAGOG. And this doth Annius alſo auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Meſech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly Weſt, and not North from Iudea. Alſo Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth of the deſtruction of Tyre, nameth Meſech and Tubal ioyntly. And for a finall proofe, that theſe Nations were of a Northerne Neighbour Land (how farre ſoeuer ſtretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horſemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all ſhall ride vpon Horſes, euen a great multitude and a mightie. Then if any man beleeue that theſe troupes came out of Spaine ouer the Pyrenes, and firſt paſſed ouer a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Helleſpont, or elſe compaſſed all Pontus, Euxinus, to come into the leſſer Aſia, which is halfe the length or compaſſe of the then knowne World, he may be called a ſtrong beleeuer, but hee ſhall neuer bee iuſtified thereby. But on the contrarie it is knowne, that Seleucis was a Prouince neighbouring Paleſtina or Iudea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) ioyned vnto it: whoſe Princes commanded all Syria, and Aſia the leſſe, (namely the Seleucidæ) and held it, till Scipio Aſiaticus ouerthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet poſſeſt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meſhech be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the ſame Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be ſaid. Firſt, he ſeated himſelfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward hee proceeded further into Aſia the leſſe; and in long tract of time his valiant Iſſue filled all Germanie, reſted long in France and Brittaine, and poſſeſſed the vtmoſt borders of the earth, accompliſhing (as Melanction well notes) the ſignification of their parents name, which is Vtmoſt bordering. But when theſe borderers wanted further place, whereinto they might exonerate their ſwelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly paſſed, oppreſſing firſt their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy reſtorer of our Antiquities, M. William Cambden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their olde Language doth ſignifie Robbers; neceſſitie inforcing them to ſpoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neere ioyned, as afterwards in the ſeates which they poſſeſſed. For that the Warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accuſtomed to be beaten by the Gaules, the authoritie of Cæſar affirming it is proofe ſufficient. But in times following they purſued richer Conqueſts, and more eaſie though further diſtant, by which (to omit their other enterprizes not here to be ſpoken of) they were drawne at length into Aſia the leſſe, and occupyed thoſe parts, which had formerly beene held by their Progenitours. I ſay not that they claymed thoſe Lands as theirs by Deſcent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore denye, that they were of olde ſeated in Aſia, becauſe in late Ages they returned thither; vnleſſe hee will thinke, that all thoſe Nations which from farre parts haue inuaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument bee proued not to haue iſſued from thence at the firſt.

Now concerning Samothes for his excellent wiſedome ſirnamed Dis, whom Annius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother Moſes neuer heard of, who ſpake his knowledge of Japhets ſonnes) they muſt finde him in ſome olde Poet: for Functius, a great Beroſian, confeſſeth: Quis hic SAMOTHES fuerit incertum eſt; Who this SAMOTHES was it is vncertaine; neyther is there any proofe that he was that ſame Dis, whom Cæſar ſayth the Gaules ſuppoſe to bee their Anceſter; yea, and Vignier confeſſeth with FVNCTIVS: Mais on ne ſcayt qui il eſtoit; No man knowes who he was.

§. V.

Againſt the fabulous BEROSVS his fiction, That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

BVt before I goe on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it neceſſarie to diſproue the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himſelfe: an inuention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wreſted) by thoſe Authours of whom him-himselfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Lauinius and others. For Annius seekes to perswade vs, that Noah (surnamed Ianus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein hee liued 92. yeares. This to disproue, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to mee, if there were nothing else to disproue it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Ninive by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. yeares. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disproue the authoritie of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so many learned men haue so demonstratiuely proued that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian in his Oration against the Greekes auoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote onely three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: but Annius hath deuised fiue Bookes, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians Annius hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the World. And if we may beleeue Eusebius better then Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Æneas) consumed but 150. yeares: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas ariuall into Italie there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Ianus (who was the first of their Kings) liued at once with Ruth, who marryed Booz, in the Worlds yeare (as some reckon) 2717. after the Floud 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeares after the Floud: and so there past betweene Ianus of Italie and Noah surnamed Ianus 704. yeares. For Saturnus succeeded Ianus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinus followed Faunus: which Latinus liued at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Iudge of Israel. Now all these fiue Kings of the Latines hauing consumed but one hundred & fiftie yeares, and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning vpwards for one hundred and fiftie yeares, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus liued.

Ann. de Hetrus. Pict. de aur. saculo. Cato de origin. Lauin. illust. de Gall.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Iauan, the fourth sonne of Iapheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Iauan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the sonne of Madea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were descended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third sonne of Iapheth.

Ezech. 27. 19. 13 & so the place of Esay 66. 19. (for Iauan) Hellada: and (for the plurall Iauanim) Hellenes.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Brittish Language hath remayned among vs aboue 2000. yeares, and the English speech euer since the inuasion of the Angles, and the same continuance haue all Nations obserued among themselues though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Ianus) had left in Italie his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could haue quite extinguished) should haue beene found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall Plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are meerly fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselues with the Grecian Ianus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeares (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinus the fift King: which also Saint Augustine and Iustine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disproue this vanitie, I may out of themselues adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camasena) the wife of this Ianus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Ianus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleeue that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to haue walked with God, to be a iust man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and vngratefull, to set vp or deuise any Heathen saluage, or Idolatrous adoration, or haue instituted any Ceremonie, contrarie to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

§. VI.

§. VI.

That GOMER also and his sonne TOGORMA of the Posteritie of IAPHETH were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spred Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

IT turne now to the sonnes of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Floud: therein I obserue, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplyed in great numbers, and dispersed themselues into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repayre to each other, and keepe intelligence by Riuer: because the Land was yet Desart and ouer-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia; Chus tooke the South part of Chaldæa, downe the Riuer of Gehon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Vr or Orchoa neere the Lakes of Chaldæa, might by the same Riuer get vp to Babylon, and receiue succour from thence. All which Tract of Land vpon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chusite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for awhile oppresst, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Hauilah, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Cush, tooke both bankes of Tigris, especially on the East side of the Riuer: by which Riuer his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Hauilah or Susian, was anciently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Susa. Cush himselfe tooke the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and Southwest-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Desart, where Ptolemie placeth the Citie of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Ptol. Asiæ, tab. 4.

Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia fœlix, had Tigris to conuey them into the Persian gulfe, which washeth the bankes of Arabia fœlix on the East side: so as those sonnes of Cush might take Land downe the Riuer as they pleased. Also the Citie of Niniue was by Nimrod founded on the said Riuer of Tigris; and from thence a Colonie past to Charran, standing also vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselues together, and tooke their seates in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselues Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, sate downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spred themselues into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witnesse Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gaue names to diuers places; as to the Mountaynes aboue Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the Citie of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius tooke appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, sauouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

Lib. 4.

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meschech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolemie calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Prouince of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaynes Moschici, in the Valley betweene the Mountaines Moschici, and the Mountaynes Paryardes: out of whose North part sprinketh the Riuer Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meschech are descended also the Moscouians (saith Melanchton) and it may bee, that in processe of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanchton) signifieth extendens, enlarging, or stretching forth.

forth. Togarma also at first did inhabite amongst his parents & kindred. The Togormians were also called Gibles; a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phœnicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gabea: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hieros olymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbaria: forgetting the prophecie of Ezekiel against the Tyrians. They of the house of Togarma, brought to thy Fayres horses, and horse-men, and mules, which could not well bee driuen ouer the whole length of the Mediterran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not denie, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Iewes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Tagar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirmes, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muscouia. But for these subderiuations it were infinit to examine them. Onely of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the floud is the matter which I labour to discouer; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could bee hardlie knowne: onely reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest; and were couered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion ouer the rest. Note.

From Madai the third sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the sonne of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth son of Iapheth: and of Mesch, of Aram, and Meshech of Iapheth.

OF Iauan the fourth sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Esay: Et mittam ex iis qui saluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam; And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Geneua here vseth the word (Tarshish) for Tarsus, a Citie in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneua vse the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italie and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themselues dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Iauan marres the fashion of that supposition, who so many yeres preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tels vs that Xuthus stole out of Thessalie with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriuing at Athens, hee was graciously receiued by Erictheus, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom hee receiued two sonnes, Ion, and Achæus, the supposed Ancesters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus;) who, when he had ioyned Megara to Attica, erected a piller in that Isthmos or Streit, which fasteneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hæc non sunt Peloponnesus, sed Ionia; These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looked towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia. Strabo out of Hecatæus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrarie to the former opinion. That the Iones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Iones was there by therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof then hee learned of the Greekes themselues, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecatæus reasonable enough. For though it were to him vnknowne, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Iauan did not flie from Tucyd.

Babylonia,

Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past ouer the neereſt way, leauing his owne name to ſome maritimate Prouince on that ſide, as he did to that part of Greece ſo called. But yet Strabo himſelfe beleeued, that Ionia tooke the name from Ion the ſon of Xanthus: for ſo much he had learned from themſelues; which was alſo the opinion of Pauſanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times caſt themſelues into that part of Asia the leſſe, oppoſite vnto thē, which they held for diuers yeres. And howſoeuer the Greekes vaunt themſelues to be Fathers of Nations, and the moſt ancient; yet all approued Hiſtorians (not their owne) deride and diſproue their pride, and vanitie therein. For this diſpute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) reſted betweene the Scythians and the Ægyptians, as Iuſtine out of Trogus, in the warre between Vexoris of Ægypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witneſſeth: which preceded farre the reigne of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is alſo manifeſt, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all ſaluages without law or religion, liuing like brute beaſts in all reſpects: and Cecrops (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) liued together with Moſes.

Lib. 18. de Ciu. Dei, c. 10.

The ſixth ſonne of Iapheth was Meſhech, whom the Septuagint call Moſoch: (a part of thoſe Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meſhech and Tubal.) But this we muſt remember, that betweene Meſech the ſonne of Aram, and Meſhech (or Moſech) the ſonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers Interpreters diuerſly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meſch, the ſonne of Aram, Mes; the Geneua, Maſh, Iunius, Meſch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Pſalme, that either Meſhech the ſonne of Iapheth, was the parent of thoſe people, or gaue name to that Prouince wherein Dauid hid himſelfe: or elſe (which may rather ſeeme) that it tooke name from Meſch the ſonne of Aram. For Dauid bewayling his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious People) vſeth theſe words: Woe is me that I remaine in Meſech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius conuerteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diù: habito tanquàm Scenitæ Kedareni: The Septuagint giues it this ſenſe: Woe is me be- cauſe my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latine agreeth: Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus eſt, habitaui cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldæan otherwiſe, and in theſe words: O me miſerum, quia peregrinatus ſum Aſianis, habitaui cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wreteh, that I am; for I haue trauailed among thoſe of Aſia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howſoeuer or which ſoeuer conuerſion be taken for the beſt, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Prouince of Arabia Petræa; and the Chaldæan putteth Aſia in ſtead of Meſech, but the Hebrew it ſelfe hath Meſech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is moſt likely, becauſe it anſwers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) ſeeing Meſh the ſonne of Aram, 1. Chron. 17. is called Meſhec, it is indifferent whether this Nation tooke name from Meſhech or Meſh, both bordering Iudæa, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for ſo Ezechiel makes Meſech and Tubal. But as for thoſe that take Meſech out of the word Moſoch (giuen by the Septuagint) to be the Muſcouian: ſure they preſume much vpon the affinitie of names, as aforeſaid. And ſure I am that Dauid neuer trauelled ſo farre North; (for to him Muſcouia was vtterly vnknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his perſecution: the ſame being a Citie on the Mountaines of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Moſoch the father of the Muſcouians: and herein alſo Melanchton runnes with the tide of common opinion, and ſets Meſech in Muſcouia, though with ſome better aduice of iudgement; as, firſt ſeated in Cappadocia, and from thence trauelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Pſalme, (Hei mihi quod exulo in Meſech) to ſignifie, Gentis eius feritatem inſignem eſſe; That the feritie of that Nation exceeded: which fierceneſſe or brutalitie of the Muſcouians, Dauid neuer practiſed, or (perchance) neuer heard of. But the ſame feritie or crueltie which thoſe Northerne Muſcouites had, may as well bee aſcribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Countrie tooke name of Kedar the ſecond ſonne of Iſmael, of whom a people of equall fiercenoſſe to any of the world were begotten, both in thoſe times and long after, euen to this day (if the Arabians, Iſmaelites, and Sarazens, may bee accounted one people:) the ſame being foreſhewed by the ſpeech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he ſhall be a wilde man: his hand ſhall be againſt euery man, and euery mans hand againſt him. Now Arabia the Deſert (ſaith Plinie) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the Eaſt, and the Cedrei Southward, both which ioyne together vpon the Nabathei. So it appeareth (as before) that Mesech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did ioyne to Mesech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the lesse, commanded by the Successors of Seleucus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Iuda. But (as I haue alreadie said) it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Mesech (or Mosoch) might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and giue names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the Mountaines Moschici in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Muscouia, and so al opinions saued. But all saluage Nations ouer-growne and vncultiuated, doe (for the most part) shew a late plantation, euen as Ciuilitie, Letters, and magnificent Building, witnesse antiquitie.

Pſal. 120. v. 5.

Tiras, the seuenth sonne of Iapheth, which Montanus reckons among the sons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthie the examination) affirme. Iosephus was the first that determined heereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the coniectures are indifferent, and giue no ground at all of dispute. Ie followeth now to speake of the sonnes of Gomer, which were three, Mont. in Chr.

Ascanez, Riphath, and Togorma.

§. VIII.

Of Ascanez and Riphath, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Ascanez was the Father of those which the Greeks call Regini, (saith Iosephus) but he giues no reason why.

Eusebius makes Ascanez the Father of the Goths. The Ietues in their Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation, but their expositions are commonly very idle. Plinie findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neere the Riuers of Hylas and Cios: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscones were descended of the Ascanez, (for Tuiscones, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanez, præposito articulo die Ascanez) and that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombes of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the lake Ascania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succor of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo similis, saith Homer) like vnto God: because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Æneas, Os humerosq; Deo similis, in face and bodie like one of the Gods. Virgil also remembreth such a Riuer, together with the Hils Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, transq; sonantem Ascanium, Appetite leades them both ouer the Mountains Gargara, and the roring Ascanius. But this Pliny maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion vpon the Riuer Ascanius, which is adioyning to Mysia, and is neere the border of the Troian Empire: and the Lake Ascanez he directs vs to finde by the description of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth far within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lyeth, euen betweene Prusia and Nicea. And so Iunius (as I conceiue him) takes them of Ascanez, to be the inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Vrbibus makes it a Citie of Troâs, built by Ascanius the son of Æneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Mysia. Of Ascania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolomie witnesseth: and Strabo giueth Ascania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Mysia, neere vnto Cio; which also agreeth with Plinie. For Plinie findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neere Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy Ascanes. Melā. in cor. l. 1 Hom. Iliad. 2. Virg. Georg. l. 3

Now, whether these places tooke name of Ascanez the son of Gomer, or of Ascanius the sonne of Æneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Troians, could not take his name from Æneas sonne, who was then eyther exceeding yong, or rather vnborne: and it seemeth that the Countries whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Mysia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, which by Hieremie is called Ascanez, by the figure Synecdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therfore which deceiue not, we may confidentlie determine. For of the Prophet Hieremie wee shall learne of what Nation the Ascenez were, whose words are these: Set vp a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nation against her, call vp the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanez. C. 51. v. 27.

against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (sayth Iunius and others before him,) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia, and Palæstina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Prouince of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the storie of Iacob and Esau, and call it Aram-padan. Then, if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Ascanez ioyned with them (who altogether vnited vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Askenaz Germanie or Almaine, for we heare of no swart Ruttiers at that siege. But the Askenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who cals them Rheginæ; or of the Iewes, who will haue them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Riphath the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius thinke that he wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that hee might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soile in those dayes for all the sonnes and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well vnderstood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (saith Melanchton) signifieth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the loue of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, desirous (saith Melanchton) of a warmer soile of fruit and Wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betweene the Baltick and Adriaticke Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possest of Lituania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boij and Hermondurij. Therefore, it seemeth to me, that of Riphath, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly betweene the Riuers of Vistula and Albis. The name (saith Melanchton) signifieth Wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by Whitemeates and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Melanch. in Carion.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue spoken already; now therefore of Iauans children, which were foure:

Elisa, Tharsis, Cethim, Dodanim.

Of the foure sonnes of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

OF Elisa or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greekes were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Æoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Æoles and the Elei, took name of Elisa, his eldest Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa. Hyacynthus & purpura de insulis Elisæ facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was thy couering: The Chaldeans for Elisa write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneua, and Iunius, keepe the word Elisa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italie

v. 7.

in those dayes, nor since, that I can reade of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better coniecture the Isles of Greece, and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Getulia.

Tharsis, the second Sonne of Iauan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (reseruing the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that coniecture. The Chaldean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Siluer, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Salomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Esion Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, neere vnto Madian, where Iethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Prouince of Arabia Petræa, Idumæa, or of the Chusites; and they sayled to the higher part of the East India. For it had beene a strange Nauigation to haue spent three yeeres in the passage betweene Iudea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue been sayled in sixe or ten daies. And if so great riches might haue bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, al the other neighbouring Princes would soon haue entertained that Trade also. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this sort written of in the first of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Nauie of Ships in Esion Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Nauie his seruants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the seruants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea then that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest Shippes, and were the first Nauigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis vsed often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Shippes of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we vse it ordinarily whersoeuer we nauigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out euery yeere, or euery three yeere to the Sea, and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharsis is truely taken for Tharsis, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second sonne of Iauan, or by his Successors in memorie of their first parent. To this Citie arriued Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first ouerthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the Riuer to bathe and washe his bodie, hee fell into an extreame Feuer, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharsis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iauan, who was to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore; gaue the Islands betweene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharsis vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third sonne of Iauan was Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, saith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (saith he) and signifieth percussores, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Esai. 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hec clamitas ab Esai predicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, venturos esse euersores Tyri ex terra Cittim, This calamitie (saith Melanchton) was foreshewed by Esai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cittim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italie, saith Beroaldus) yet wee must take the first performance of the former Prophesie, which tooke effect by the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander, who after 7. Moneths siege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces seauen thousand principall Citizens; strangled two thousand, and changed the freedome of 13. thousand others into bondage and slaueric. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainelie in the first of the Macchabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the ſonne of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and ſlew Darius King of the Perſians, and Medes. Ioſephus ſets Cethim in the Iſle of Cyprus, in which (ſaith hee) there remaineth the Citie Citium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philoſopher (witneſſe Laertius) which Citie Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it ſtood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may bee that all the Iſlands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Iſlands of Cethim: and in that ſenſe might Cyprus be ſo called alſo; and yet becauſe Tharſis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer againſt it, it is alſo very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharſis: and finding that Iſland too ſtreight for his people after they were increaſed, & that the reſt of the Coaſts, both on Aſia ſide and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he ſent Colonies ouer the Ægæan Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth ſonne of Iauan, and the yongeſt Brother (by the moſt opinions) ſate downe at Rhodes, as neere Cethim, Tharſis, and Eliſa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are vſed indifferently by many Tranſlators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are ſo like, as the one may eaſily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is alſo found in Epirus the Citie of Dodona, in the Prouince of Moloſſia. And as Cethim, when he wanted ſoile in Cyprus: ſo Dodanim (ſeated in a far leſſe Iſland) did of neceſſitie ſend his people farther off; and keeping alongſt the Coaſt, and finding Peloponneſus in the poſſeſſion of Eliſa, he paſſed a little further on the Weſtward, and planted in Epirus. And though the Citie of Dodona, was not then built, or (perchance) not ſo ancient as Dodanim himſelfe, yet his Poſteritie might giue it that name in the memorie of their firſt parent, as it hapned all the World ouer. For names were giuen to Cities, Mountaines, Riuers, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themſelues, but by their ſucceſſors many yeeres after: euery of their Families being deſirous to retain among them by thoſe memories, out of what branch themſelues were taken, and grafted elſewhere. And becauſe great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerers newly named, and the greateſt Cities often fired and demoliſhed: therefore thoſe that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their owne names, or the names of their Anceſtors, to Mountaines and Riuers, as to things (after their iudgements) freeſt from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan ſettle himſelfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Aſia the leſſe, towards the Sea-ſhore: and afterward in Greece, and the Iſlands, and neighbor Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the leſſer Aſia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Meſech, and the reſt round about him. And in like ſort did Chuſh (the ſonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldæa, and the borders thereof towards the Weſt and South-weſt: and the ſonnes of Chuſh (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it ſelfe) trauelled Southward in Arabia fœlix, and Southweſtward into Arabia petræa: the reſt of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chuſh in like manner tooke the way of Ægypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Paleſtina adioyning. The Sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all thoſe Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to thoſe of the ſons of Shem, which ſpred themſelues towards the Weſt, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I ſhall ſpeake hereafter. But firſt of the ſonnes of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Chuſh, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the ſeat of Chuſh the eldeſt ſon of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of ſtrange Fables, and ill Tranſlations of Scripture, grounded on the miſtaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Ioſephus his Tale of an Æthiopeſſe wife of Moſes, grounded on the miſtaking of the ſeate of Chuſh.

THat Ham was the Father of the Ægyptians, it is made manifeſt in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Pſalme verſe 51. Then Iſrael came to Ægypt, and Iacob was a ſtranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Pſalme, Hee ſlew all the firſt-borne in Ægypt, euen the beginning of their ſtrength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also found a great Citie in Thebaida, called Cheramis: (as it were the Citie of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Iland in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chush could not be Æthiopia: yet seeing it commeth now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther proofe to the former. For the manifestation hereof, sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senceless interpretations. Surely, howsoeuer the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, that Chush could not be Æthiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happie and the Desart: which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate downe altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleereth this Controuersie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chush for Æthiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grosly mistaken, or vainely led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chush was Æthiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. vers. 1. is called a woman of Cush) was a woman of the land of Æthiopia, faineth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Æthiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers Citie; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Countrie, and friends, with the Citie it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he had described the strength of the Æthiopian Citie Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cùm Moses desidere exercitum otiosum agrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum Regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was grieued that his Armie lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not sally and come to handy strokes, there happened this accident in the meane while. The Æthiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults giuen, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not onely vp-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Æthiopians to the very brinke of subuersion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, shee made meanes to send vnto him by one of her trustiest seruants to offer her selfe vnto him, and become his wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliuer the Citie into his possession; whereunto she condescending, and Moses hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

THis Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also vtterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a Citie of Arabia for a Citie of Æthiopia: as he names Æthiopia it selfe to haue beene the Countrie of Moses his Wife, when (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Æthiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, saying that the Sabeans are Arabians and not Æthiopians; except Iosephus can perswade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisedome of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And though Damianus à Goes speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prester Iohn, of the Abissines: wherein that Æthiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princesse: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sishac King of Egypt inuaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioyned vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to haue beene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the body of Egypt, and neere Esion Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumæa ioyneth to the Tribe of Iuda by the North, to Arabia Petræa by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if wee marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, he had formerly liued fortie yeeres; where it seemeth, that besides his carefull bringing vp in Egypt, he was instructed by Iethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisedome of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharao, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, when Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro his Father in Law, Priest of Madian, and draue the Flocke to the Desart, and came to the Mountaine of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if we may beleeue Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and Friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianitish. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest meanes: so it pleased him from a Shepheard to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other shepheards, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Iethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

V. 15.

Exod. 2.

From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumæa, and finding the insupportable gouernement of such a multitude, he aduised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Iudges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had beene an Æthiopian, it had beene a farre progresse for him to haue passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumæa: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that fauoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petræa (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandred fortie yeeres, and did by these late trauailes of his, seeke to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plentie and rest. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Desarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those hee might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandements.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrisamensis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words haue this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas vxores habuisse Moses, &c. Apollinaris also lyeth, in affirming that Moses had two wiues: and who doth not perceiue these things fained by them? for it is manifest that the wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Æthiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that ioyneth to Arabia: so farre Chrisamensis.

Ezech. 29. 10.

vpon thee and vpon thy Riuers, and I will make the Land of Egypt vtterly waſte and deſolate, from the Towre of Seueneh, euen to the borders of the blacke-Moores: which laſt words ſhould haue beene thus conuerted: From the Towre of Seueneh to the borders of the Chuſites or Arabians: betweene which two is ſituated all Egypt. For to ſay, from the borders of Seueneh to the Æthiopians, hath no ſenſe at all. Seneueh it ſelfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Æthiopia, or the Land of the black-Moores. So as if Nabuchodonoſors conqueſt had beene but betweene Seneueh and the border of Æthiopia, it were as much to ſay, and did expreſſe no other victory then the conqueſt of all that Land and Countrie, lying betweene Middleſex and Buckingham, where both the Countries ioyne together; or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the ſame ſenſe with the former, if any man ſought to expreſſe by theſe two bounds, the Conqueſt of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seueneh or Syene is the South bound of Ægypt, ſeated in Thebaida which toucheth Æthiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonoſor neuer entred into any part of Æthiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneua, and all other (in effect) haue written Æthiopia for Chuſh.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. verſ. 9. in the like manner miſtaken.

AND as the former, ſo is this place of Ezechiel miſtaken, by being in this ſort conuerted: In die illa egredientur nuncij à facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Æthiopiæ confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in Engliſh by the Geneuians: In that day ſhall there Meſſengers goe forth from me in ſhips to make the careleſſe Moores afraid. Now the Latine for (ſhips) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes which are Gallyes of three bankes, and not ſhips. But that in this place the Tranſlation ſhould haue beene (as in the former) amended by vſing the word Chuſh or Arabia for Æthiopia or the blacke Moores, euery man may ſee which meanely vnderſtandeth the Geographie of the World, knowing, that to paſſe out of Egypt into Æthiopia there neede no Gallies nor ſhips, no more then to paſſe out of Northampton into Leiceſterſhire: Æthiopia being the conterminate Region with Egypt, and not diuided ſo much as by a Riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonoſor ſhould ſend Gallies alongſt the coaſt of the Red Sea, by which an Armie might be tranſported into Arabia the Happy and the Stonie (ſparing the long wearieſome march ouer all Egypt, and the Deſart of Pharan) which Armie might thereby ſurpriſe them vnawares in their ſecuritie and confidence. For when Nabuchodonoſor was at Seueneh within a mile of Æthiopia, he needed neither Galley nor Ship to paſſe into it: being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwiſe parted from it, then one In-land ſhire is parted from another; and if hee had a fancie to haue rowed vp the Riuer but for pleaſure, he could not haue done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling ouer high and ſteepie Mountaines) called Catadupa Nili, were at hand.

Laſtly, as I haue already obſerued, the ſonnes of euery father ſeated themſelues as neere together as poſſibly they could, Gomer and his ſonnes in Aſia the leſſe; Iauan and his ſons in Greece, and the Ilands adioyning; Shem in Perſia and Eaſtward. So the Sons and Grandchildren of Chuſh from the Riuer of Gehon (their Fathers firſt ſeat) inhabited vpon the ſame, or vpon ſome other contiguat vnto it, as Nimrod and Hauilah on the one ſide, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the reſt) did on the other ſide. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had neuer any acquaintance or fellowſhip, any war, treatie of peace, or other intelligence with the Æthiopian blacke Moores, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradiſe.

†. V.

Apl ce, Eſay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chuſh for Æthiopia.

AND as in theſe places before remembred, ſo in diuers other is the word Æthiopia put for Arabia or Chuſh, which puts the ſtorie (where it is ſo vnderſtood) quite out of ſquare; one Kingdome thereby being taken for another. For what ſenſe hath this part of of Scripture, Esay 18. Va terræ Cymbalorum alarum quæ est trans flumina Æthiopiæ, or according to the Septuagint in these words: Va terræ nauium alarum quæ est trans fluuios Æthiopiæ? woe to the land shaddowing with wings, which is beyond the Riuers of Æthiopia, sending Embassadors by sea, euen the vessels of reeds vpon the waters. Va terræ umbrosa ora; woe to the Land of the shadie coast, saith Iunius. The former Translators vnderstand it in this sense; That the waters are shaddowed with the sailes, which are significatiuely called the wings of the ships, the other, that the Coast of the Sea was shaddowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Esay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Esay repeateth, and by the former translation euery man may see the transposition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is transported vnto the other side of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia set next vnto Iudæa, when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeede that lyeth betweene Iudæa and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is seated vnder the Equinoctiall line. And of this Beroaldus asketh a materiall question, (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Riuers of Æthiopia: Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an vnknowne Region. Now if Æthiopia it selfe be vnder the Equinoctiall line, with whom the Iewes had neuer any acquaintance, why should any man dreame that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it againe, and beyond the Riuers of Æthiopia? except we shall impiously thinke that the Prophet spak he knew not what, or vsed an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discouered in 2000. yeeres after, inhabiting as farre South as the Cape of good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona esperanza.

†. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the storie of Senacherib, and Zera in the storie Asa are vnaduisedly made Æthiopians.

AND by this translation is the storie of Senacherib vtterly mistaken in the cause of his retrait. For Senacherib was first repulsed at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Iudæa: when hauing certaine knowledge that Thirrhaca, (which all the Interpreters call King of Æthiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to with-draw himselfe: and fearing to leaue his Armie in two parts, hee sent threatning Messengers to Ezechia King of Iuda, perswading him to submit himselfe: the Tenor whereof is set downin the second of Kings in these words: Haue any of the gods of the Nations deliuered his Land out of the hands of the King of Assur? where is the god of Hamah? &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Hierusalem, he then meant to haue vnited that great Armie before Hierusalum, commanded by Rabsekeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great Citie vpon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Iudæa and Beniamin with a third Armie, (which himselfe commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But vpon the rumor of that Arabian Armie led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Iosephus cals Tharsices) Rabsakeh hasted from the siege of Hierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis and set downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthoropolis, as some haue supposed. But while he had ill successe at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himselfe whom hee least feared, strook his Army before Hierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Armie of Tirrakeh was from Arabia, Iosephus himselfe makes it plaine. For he confesseth in the tenth Booke the first Chapter of the Iewes Antiquities, that it was come to Senatheribs knowledge, that the Armie which was a foot (both to releeue the Ægyptians and the Iewes) marched towards him by the way of the Desart: Now the Desart which lay indifferent betweene Hierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabiaes, to wit, the Stonie, of which it is a part: the Desart, and the Happy: and by no other way indeede could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desart betweene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet beene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then, this Scripture of the second of Kings, Verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse:

Ioseph. l. 10. c. 1.

Kings 2. 19.

Antiq. l. 10. Kings 2. 19.

Lib. 10. cap. 1.

He

He heard also a man say of Thirhakeh King of Æthiopia &c. whereas it should haue beene thus conuerted with Iunius: Audiens autem de Thirhakeh Rege Chushi; Hee heard also of Thirhakeh King of the Chushites. For they were the Chushites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom the very smoake of Iuda flaming was blowne, being their neerest Neighbours: and so were not the Æthiopian black-Moores vnder the Equinoctiall, whom neither war nor peace (which discouereth all Regions) euer found out, saith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia then Zerah was, who inuaded Asia King of Iuda, with an Armie of a Million, and three thousand Charriots. Indeed, how such an Armie & those Charriots should passe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mighrie Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how farre distant, iudge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there euer such strength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Æthiopians such trauailers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chush being first so conuerted for Æthiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seates of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or inuasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

Plin. l. 5. c. 9.

2. Chron. c. 14.

†. VII.

A farther exposition of the place, Esay 18. 1.

COncerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Esay, Nauium alarum; Winged ships, (so the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) sayles whistling in the windes, or terra vmbrosa ora (after Iunius) the Land of a shaddowed coast, or the Land shaddowing with wings, as our English Geneua hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome haue one sense in effect. For the sailes are commonly called the wings of a ship; and we vse to say ordinarily when our ships saile slowly, that she wanteth wings: (that is) when her sailes are either worne or too narrow; and we also vse the same phrase of the winde whistling in the sailes. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sails were said to giue a shaddow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Esay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth signifie both to shaddow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Woe to thee, O Egypt, which doest promise to others safeguard vnder the shaddow of thy wings, which (indeede) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Esay: and this phrase is often elsewhere vsed, as in the sixteenth Psalme: Sub vmbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me vnder the shaddow of thy wings. The Boates of reede spoken of are of two kindes; either of basket-willow couered with hides (as anciently in Brittaine) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I haue seene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

THe second sonne of Ham was Mizraim, (who according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabite. For Chush first possest Chaldæa on the West side of Gehon chiefly, and from thence, as he increased in people, he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the South-east side of Iudæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past ouer into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt; and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these foure brothers possest all that Tract of Land from Gehon in Chaldæa as farre to the West as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilæa, Samaria, and Iudea; with the two Egypts, whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and Thebaïs (called the vpper Egypt) stretcheth it selfe toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Aethiopians or blacke Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt betweene them. And in the same manner did all their sons againe, and all the sons of the rest of Noahs children, sort themselues.

and

§. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their antiquities seeme more fabulous.

THis flourishing Kingdome possest by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Aegyptus (otherwise Ramesses, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argiues were made Danai, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the flood, in the time of Iosua, as S. Augustine coniectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odysses it appeareth that the Aegyptians were so called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Appion) numbreth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393. yeeres. By which other men coniecture, that the Aegyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Iosua, and about 1000. yeeres after the flood. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israel to be those Hycsos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grosly deceiued, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon sayneth: nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporarie with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000. yeeres; and that the Stars had foure times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirme, that they are more ancient then Iupiter and the Moone, whereof Ouid:

Ante Iouem genitum terras habuisse feruntur
Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moone did shine, or Ioue was bred.

But for those 13000. yeeres it may well be true: seeing it is certaine that the Aegyptians reckon their yeeres by Moneths, which makes after that account not aboue 1000. or 1100. yeers, whether we take their Moneths or Lunarie yeeres to haue beene of the first kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those fiue diuersities of their Lunarie yeeres.

§. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Aegyptians.

GErardus Mercator in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquitie in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynastie (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Aegyptians times) had beginning with the generall flood: and that therefore the first of the other fifteene reached the Creation, or soone after it. To which coniecture of Mercator, Peresius maketh this answere: That therein Mercator was first deceiued, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the fifteenth Dynastie was at once with the generall flood: which Eusebius maketh 292. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynastie (being in number 179.) in the time of their first King, Salatis, to haue beene in the yeere of the World 1684. which Eusebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastia was begun but in the 292. yeeres after the floud, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynastia to endure 115. yeres, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse then 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but sixe yeeres; the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the floud: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the floud, and the 16. to haue beene then in being at the time of the floud, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrarietie of falshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod with the sonnes of Noah came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor farre-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conueyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spaine, in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arriual into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnaduised. For he makes Ægypt possest, and a gouernment established in the very first yeere of the arriuall of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neere in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them vpon all the earth.

†. IIII.

Against Pererius: that it is not vnlikely, but that Ægypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Floud.

BVt whereas Pererius seeketh to ouerthrow this Antiquitie of the Ægyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I doe not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either vnlikely or impossible that Ægypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Floud, I doe verily beleeue the contrary: and that not onely of Ægypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodò enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeò multiplicari potuit, vt ad Ægyptum vsq; habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the world, and so propagated as to inhabite and fill Ægypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our sauing beleefe, it is lawfull for euery man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cauilling humour: for I thinke it the part of euery Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilitie of vnion, then out of froward subtletie, and preiudicate resoluednesse, to maintaine factions needelesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, to this opinion, that Ægypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, not at all before the Floud, I say that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, then to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Floud double; & (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and abilitie, to beget many Children: and at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinitie. And that there was a speedie increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue beene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues built a Citie, (called Enoch) after the name of his first borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the Citie and Towre of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeeres by Berosus; and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancie of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, euen within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) aswell Assyria, Syria, and Ægypt might be possest before the Floud, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeeres after the Floud, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie to proue it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Againe, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and she left not all her Kingdomes emptie) doe well proue, that if the World had such plentie of people in so few yeeres after the Floud, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus gouerned Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Floud of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Floud to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more then 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be giuen. And if but one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needes be, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue beene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Ægypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleeue Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Iustine) Ægypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these be his owne words, speaking of Ninus. Fuêre quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Ægypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Ægypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one inuaded Pontus, the other Ægypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witnesse, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbreth the Armies wherewith Ninus inuaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroastres Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for forreigne authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Ægypt was possest by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultiue a desolate and ouergrowne ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time then 200. yeeres after the Floud; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Floud. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Floud; so as not onely Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Ægypt, Palastina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be compresst, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Floud? euen necessitie, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially, where Death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld liuing Nations of his owne body.

†. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

For what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres? Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather then that they were not spred ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceede 50. yeeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of soules had the first Ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceiued. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue beene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (sauing such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliue; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamie might haue beene increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty ones of the first Age obserued no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberall time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselues to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men careless of life, and fearelesse of death, then the little time which keepes them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this enuious old Age of the World mingleth together, and soweth with the seeds of Mankinde?

Now if that Berosus or Annius may be alleadged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the Citie of Enoch was seated neere Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palastina (which is also a Prouince of Syria) and Ægypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betweene his death and the Floud, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be reiected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let vs choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainely in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Floud: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hierusalem Iewes: men that feared God of euery Nation vnder Heauen: yet by words which follow in Berosus, it is plaine that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Againe, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at aduenture, or left them as Discouerers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had beene inhabited. And it cannot be denyed that the earth was more passable and easie to trauaile ouer before the Floud, then after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Attica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left vpon the Earth) was vninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogyges Floud; whereby we may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries, after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) incopsed for 100. or 130. yeeres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first Age, then after the generall ouerflowing.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moſes, Gen. 10. v. vltimo, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

LAſtly, whereas Pererius drawes this Argument out of the laſt Verſe of the tenth of Geneſis, And out of theſe were the Nations diuided after the flood: Quo ſignificatur talem diuiſionem non fuiſſe ante diluuium, By which it appeareth (ſaith Pererius) that there was no ſuch diuiſion before the Flood; which he alſo ſeeketh to confirme out of the eleuenth of Geneſis, becauſe the diuiſion of tongues was cauſe of the diſperſion of the people. This conſequence, quo ſignificatur, &c. ſeemeth to me very weake: the Text it ſelfe rather teacheth the contrary: for out of theſe (ſaith Moſes) were the Nations diuided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were diuided out of others, though after the Flood out of theſe onely. But whatſoeuer ſenſe may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or diuiſion in that Age: for if there were none elſe among whom the earth could be diuided after the Flood, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that neceſſary diuiſion controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleaged that the confuſion of ſpeech was the cauſe of this diſperſion; it is true, that it was ſo for that preſent; but if Babel had neuer beene built, nor any confuſion of Languages at all, yet increaſe of people and time would haue enforced a farther-off and generall Plantation: as Beroſus ſayes well, that when Mankinde were exceedingly multiplyed, Ad comparandas nouas ſedes neceſſitas compellebat, They were driuen by neceſſitie to ſeeke new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before ſaid) that within 300. yeeres after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, ſuch multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not haue ſuſtained thoſe numbers with their increaſe for any long time: all Aſia the greater and the leſſer; all Scythia, Arabia, Paleſtina, and Ægypt, with Greece, and the Iſlands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia being alſo at that time fully peopled. And if wee beleeue Beroſus, then not onely thoſe parts of the World, but (within 140. yeares after the Flood) Spaine, Italie and France were alſo planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 1656. yeeres before the Flood, in the time of the chiefe ſtrength of Mankind, they were repleniſhed with people. And certainly ſeeing all the World was ouerflowne, there were people in all the World which offended.

Lib. 3.

†. VII.

A concluſion, reſoluing of that which is moſt likely, touching the Ægyptian Antiquities: with ſomewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham*) which peopled Lybia.*

THerefore, for the Antiquitie of the Ægyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Vulgar, which giue too much credit to the Ægyptians Antiquities: ſo I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities ſo fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, That Ægypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or leſſe after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim ſome Monuments in Pillers or Altars (of ſtone or mettall) of their former Kings or Gouernours: which the Ægyptians hauing added to the liſt and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in ſucceeding time (out of the vanitie of glory or by ſome corruption in their Prieſts) ſomething beyond the truth might be inſerted. And that the memory of Antiquitie was in ſuch ſort preſerued, Beroſus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and ſo doth Epigenes. For they both write that the vſe of Letters and the Art of Aſtronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conqueſt: and this report Annius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 1034. yeeres before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds deſtruction, both by Water and Fire; as alſo of Chriſt his comming in iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witneſſed. But leauing theſe Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and euery man to his owne reaſon, I will conclude this Plantation of Ægypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Ægypt from Ægyptus the ſonne of Belus, as aforeſaid. Being diuided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterran Sea, was called the inferiour Ægypt; ſurnamed alſo Delta: becauſe the ſeuerall branches of Nilus breaking aſunder from one body of the Riuer, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east and imbraced the Sea, next vnto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the Citie of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yeelded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous Citie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Ægypt is bounded betweene Memphis and Syene neere Æthiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Citie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Ciuitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Iosephus cals Ægypt Mersin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirmes that it had once the name of Thebais. Ioſ. l. 1. Ant. c. 7. Hero. Euterpe.

Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutei, (saith Iosephus) and Plinie mentioneth the Riuer Fut in Mauritania: which Riuer from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chush and Lud were contermini and Associates with the Ægyptians. L. 5. c. 1.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

Canaan (the fourth sonne of Ham) possest all that Region called by the Romanes Palæstina; in the Scriptures Galilæa, Samaria, and Iudæa; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar vntill Azzah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorha, and Admah, and Zeboim, euen vnto Lasha. Now howsoeuer these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be conuerted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorha the East, and the other Cities named stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Ægypt, the vttermost Territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the sonnes of Canaan which possest this Countrie, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleuen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Iebusi or Iebusæus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgesbi or Girgesæus.
6. Heus or Chiueus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Sini or Sinæus.
9. Araadi or Aruadæus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamatheus, or Chamathæus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Heuites, Iebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zamari or Samareus, or from some of his.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser: for Asser, Zabulon, and Nephtali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Asserites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seuen principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and Heuites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Besor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vttermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Desart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus iuramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeast as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarahs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.
Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

Iebusæus, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborne Nation, and held their Citie and the Countrie neere it, till such time as Dauid by Gods assistance recouered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Iordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Iordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Cœlesyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountaines of Iuda, and in Idumæa neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose heighth was like the heighth of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oake.

†. IIII.
Of the Gergesites, Heuites, and Harkites.

THe fift sonne of Canaan was Gergeseus or Gergesion, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomie sets the Citie Gerasa, which Iosephus cals Gesera in the Territorie of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the possessed with Diuels; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: because their Swine filled with the euill spirits, drowned themselues in the Sea of Galilee. Gergeseus also built Berytus (sometime Geriu) afterward Fœlix Iulia, three miles from the Riuer Adonis in Phœnicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gaue many large priuiledges.

Heueus the sixth sonne, and Father of the Heuites, inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. These Heuites, howsoeuer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembred) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iosua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased vtterly to roote out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times serued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Iudges the third: They remained to prone Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandements of God.

The seuenth sonne was Araceus or Harki, who betweene the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer against Tripolis) built the Citie of Archas, Arce, or Area, afterwards Arachis.

† V.

†. V.
Of Sini and Aruadi.

Sineus the eight ſon, Hieroſolymitanus ſets at Caparorſa, which Ptolomie findes in Iudæa, not farre from Iebus; to the South thereof, ſaith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sim; Ptolemie, Simyra: Mela and Plinie, Simyrus: Brochard, Sycon, (called Synochis) neere Arca. Pererius thinkes that Sineus inhabited the Deſarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but heerof there is no other certaintie then the report of Brochard, who tooke view of all theſe places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is alſo another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwiſe Kenei) who deſcended of Hobab the ſon of Raguel the Madianite, who aſſiſted the Iſraelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But theſe Cinæi were admitted among the Iſraelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephtalims, beſide their habitations with the Amalekites: againſt theſe Cinei, Balaam prophecied, that they ſhould be deſtroyed by the Aſſyrians. Iudg. 4. Iosua 19. 33.

The ninth ſonne was Aradeus or Aruadeus, who in the Ile of Aradus built the Citie Arados: oppoſite againſt which Iland on the Maine of Phœnicia, they founded another Citie of that name, which for oppoſition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came S. Peter (ſaith Clement) & in this Ile preached the Goſpell, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but wee finde no ſuch worke of his in the Acts of the Apoſtles. Both theſe two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies againſt the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Aruad were thy Mariners. Gul. Tyr. Vitr. Cap. 27. v. 8.

†. VI.
Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth ſonne, there are diuers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Cœleſyria at Edeſſa, and founded Samaraim, which in Iosua is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is alſo Samaraim (of the ſame Orthographie) vpon the Mountains of Ephraim (ſaith Beroaldus) mentioned in the ſecond of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine conuerteth amiſſe (ſaith he) by Semeron. The Hieroſolymitan Paraphraſt makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emiſſani, which Plinie calls the Hemiſſeni, in Cœleſyria; and it may be that it was their firſt habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited thoſe other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the firſt of Kings (ſpeaking of Omri) diſproueth: And he bought the Mountayne Samaria or Shemeron of one Shemer, for two talents of ſiluer, and built in the Mountayne: and called the name of the Citie which hee built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samaria. But of all theſe places I ſhall ſpeake more at large in the conqueſt of the holy Land, by the children of Iſrael. Of whomſoeuer the Samaritanes were deſcended, ſure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and baſe: for as long as the ſtate of the Iewes ſtood vp, they alwaies called themſelues Iewes: when it ſuffered or ſanke, they then vtterly denied to be of that Nation or Familie; for at ſuch time as they were returned from their firſt captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Aſſyrians; and partly of the naturalls. Beroal. in Chr. lib. 4. 1 Kin. 16. 28.

†. VII.
Of Hamathi.

THe laſt of Canaans ſonnes was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: (ſaith Beroaldus,) of which (the aſpiration taken away) the ſame is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was preſent. Ioſephus and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch with ſtandeth on the Riuer Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena: betweene the Mountayne Caſſius and the Prouince of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which Saint Peter was Biſhop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, ſurnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus ſuppoſeth, which ſtandeth betweene

Apamea

Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis: Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch vpon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than euer any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea, betweene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betweene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephtali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directlie proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remained vnpossest, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad vnder mount Hermon, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vsed, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: becaus Dauid accepted the presents of Toh King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not haue done, if that Territorie had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recouered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great waight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath bee comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua: for Emath is indeede situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Hermon, which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the Mountaines, and the Citie in Nephtalim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Nephtalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Assedim: which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath; Iosephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabsakeh vanteth in the second of Kings: Where is the god of Hamath?

Cap. 18. & 19.

§. XIII.

Of the sonnes of Chush (excepting Nimrod) of whom hereafter.

The sonnes of Chush were, { Seba, Hauila, Sabta, Raama, Sabteca, Nimrod. } And the sonnes of Raama were, { Sheba, and Dedan.

†. I.

That most of the sonnes of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabeans that robbed Iob: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

SEba or Saba was the eldest sonne of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham, to make a difference betweene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the son of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus:) his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the sonne of Regma with an (S) asperate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma possest both the shores of Arabia Fœlix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as neerest his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Plinie: Sabæi Arabum populi propter thura clarissimi ad vtraq; maria porrecti is gentibus habitant; The Sabeans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to witte) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrie was afterwards called Arabia, a populi mixtione, saith Postellus. To this agreeth Ptolomie, who setteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leaue Sabta: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomie, because becauſe he remembreth a Nation (called Sabei) neere the Perſian Sea; and Maſſabatha which deſcended of them. But Montanus hath ſent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama into Carmania, for which I ſee no reaſon. Ioſephus, who onely attended his owne fancies, hath baniſhed Saba or Seba to the border of Æthiopia. But Beroaldus thinkes it ſtrange, that the Sabai, which ſtole away Iobs Cattle, ſhould runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petræa, and finde out Iob in Traconitis, betweene Paleſtina and Cœleſyria 1200. miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, ſo do I thinke, that neither the Sabai on the Red Sea, nor thoſe toward the Perſian Sea, could by any meanes execute the ſtealth vpon Iob, which ſoeuer Beroaldus ſhall take for neereſt. But theſe were the Sabei of Arabia the Deſart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is ſeated: the ſame which Ptolomie calls Saue, now Semiſcaſac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Deſart, came thoſe Magi or Wiſe men which worſhipped Chriſt, ſaith Melchior, whoſe words are theſe: The Magi came neither out of Meſopotamia (as Chryſoſtome, Hierome, and Ambroſe ſuppoſed) nor out of Arabia the Happie, as many wiſe men doe beleeue, but out of Saba in Arabia the Deſart: which Citie when my ſelfe was there, was (as I iudged it) called Semiſcaſac. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that theſe Sabei were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to inuade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well thoſe on the Perſian Sea, as thoſe on the Red Sea) are ſo diſioyned with large Deſarts, as there is no poſſibilitie for ſtrangers to paſſe them, eſpecially with any numbers of Cattell, both in reſpect of the Mountaines, of the ſands, and of the extreame want of water in thoſe parts: Vbi nec homines, nec beſtiæ videntur, nec aues, imò nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, ſed non niſi montes ſaxoſi, altiſſimi, aſperrimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beaſts, no not ſo much as birds, or trees, nor any paſture or graſſe, but onely ſharpe, and high ſtonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Pererius conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to viſit Salomon, was of the Sabei on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia Fœlix; but the contrarie ſeemeth more probable, and that ſhe was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petræa, twixt Idumæa and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Miaian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the Weſt part of Arabia Fœlix, being his neighbour, might without any farre trauaile enter his Territories, free from all danger of ſurpriſe by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auoid tediouſneſſe, it is manifeſt that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the poſſeſſors of Arabia the Happy, and the Deſart: onely Hauilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the Eaſt ſide Chuſh, who held Arabia Petræa. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the ſame Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomie; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there were ſometimes found ſixtie Temples. Ezekiel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eaſterne Arabians their merchandiſe witneſſeth, formerlie repeated in the Chapter of Paradiſe. For Ioſephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Æthiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Æthiopians Aſtabari, they be not worthie any farther anſwere then hath already beene giuen: eſpecially ſeeing theſe Cities preſeruing the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in ſome letters changed. As alſo in the coaſts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Cuſh, with little alterations are preſerued. In Arabia the Deſart is found the Citie Saba or Saue, (now Semiſcaſac) with the Cittie of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomie himſelfe called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the happie is found the Citie of Rhegama, and Rabana; which alſo keepeth the ſound of Rhegma, the Cittie of Saptha or Saptah, not farre from the Eaſt-coaſt of Arabia: as alſo the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha; and to the Weſt of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabai: and to the South thereof againe toward the ſtreight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all theſe his Brothers and Nephewes which were ſeated on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia, Hauilah by the paſſage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom hee might paſſe by Boate euen vnto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, ſet neere the Riuer of Lar towards the mouth of the Perſian Sea, which flood in Ptolomies time.

† II.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush to haue beene seated in the West Æthiopia, disproued out of Ezech: and Hieremie.

AND whereas Iosephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious heerein) sent Dedan the sonne of Raamah into West Æthiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verses, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Æthiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) aboue foure thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezekiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Charriots; and these Westerne Æthiopians neuer saw cloth, till the Portugalls seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrie being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Ciuet Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or yron chiefly.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone, was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Æthiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterran Sea, were a strange, or rather a fooliſh fancie. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which seates they held by that name in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremie his owne words: Fly, yee Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of Esaw vpon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumæans: and Idumæa is a Prouince of Arabia Petræa: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Fœlix, ioyned in that part to Petræa, the seat of his Grand-father Chush; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumæans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand vpon Edom, and Ezech cap. 25. vers. 13. destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

AFter Chush it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (saith S. Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder sonne of Mizraim, was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his brothers dispersed themselues into all the Regions adioyning. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but hee is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem beeing written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who ioyneth them in this sort together: Come vp ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moores, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Ægyptians being of one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut & Lud are ioyned together. Æthiopia (or Chush) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chush; (which were the Chusites) the sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Ægyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Ægypt and Africa shall fall together. Hieroſolymitanus findes also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleeue it: because Hieremie ioyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to bee called Lubim or Lubei, a name somewhat neerer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truer

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a signe of the plurall number, as aim of the dual.

Cap. 46. v. 9.

writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it heere to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatning to be meant against the people of Lydia, a Citie (saith he) between Ægypt and Palæstina, which opinion I could not mislike if the Citie of Lydia were so seated. But Lydia (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Citie which was afterward Diospolis, in which S. Peter cured Æneas of the palsey) standeth neere the Torrent Gaas, not farre from Ioppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet is it not impossible but that this Citie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, manie Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third sonne of Mizraim: and so doth Postellus; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraims sonnes haue no proper Countries giuen them in the Scriptures, sauing Casluhim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleset.

These Casluhim inhabited Cassiotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Ægypt from Palæstina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountaine Casius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated neere Casluhim in that Tract of Ægypt called Sethrotis, not farre from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Plinie, Sethroitis, of the Citie Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemie calls Hercules parua. Of the Casluhim and Caphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Ægypt, of whom Palæstina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) doe not vse the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph.). Their principall Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gasæi, Ascalonitæ, Azotij, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ. Isidore affirmes, that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that Citie the Countrie adioyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was also King of the Philistims, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims vnto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech gouerned the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successors called themselues by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land vpon the Mediterran Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Cæsarea Palestina, or Stratons Towre) which was the South-border of Phœnicia, to Gasa, or to the Riuer of Ægypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: and Goliah was of Geth one of the fiue Cities aboue named. They had sometimes fiue Kings, saith Lyranus. They mastered the Israelites at seuerall times aboue 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel, but in the end this yoke was taken off by Dauid, and laid on themselues.

Basil vpon the 33. Psalme. Hierome vpon the 29. of Ezechiel.

It is obiected, that because these Cities and the Countries adioyning, were held by the sonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Iosua, yet at the time of the promise it was possest by the Canaanites, as in the second of Deuteronomie. The Heuites dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremie witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim; Haue not I brought vp Israel out of the land of Ægypt, and the Philistims from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? so I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palæstinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conuersion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Citie directly West from Ægypt, betweene Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia vnder the Assyrians: Iunius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneua.

Hierem. 47. 4.

Amos c. 9. v. 7.

But

But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palastina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palastina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

Cap. 16. v. 9.

§. XV.
Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.
Of Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sonnes of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Ashur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THe posteritie of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them hee proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Storie of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these fiue sonnes the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him & Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsall of their names, sauing that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Nineueh) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauing India) which I beleeue Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Ioctan afterward repayred. Hij filij Sem ab Euphrate fluuio partem Asiæ vsq; ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred Actes 2. vers. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to bee out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchie being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witnesse Daniel:) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the Riuer Eulæus (according to Ptolomie) in Daniel, Vlai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

Ptol. Asia tab. 3. Dan. 8. 2.

Ashur (as most Historians beleeue) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdayning the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Nineueh, of equall beautie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disproue that opinion. Euery mans hand hath beene in this Storie, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often inuaded and spoyled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoeuer Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honor this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfullest Princes among them, had yet the Mountaine Taurus for the vtmost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them whom my Fathers haue destroyed? as Gozan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden which were at Telassar. Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the Citie Sepharuaim, Hena and Iuah? All these were indeede but pettie Kings of Cities, and small Countries, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iturea, vnder Libanus: the Ile of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea; Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Ægypt had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina and Phœnicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire: from whom the most memorable storie of the World taketh beginning. Esay 37. v. 12.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldaans, saith Saint Hierome, and Iosephus, but it must bee those Chaldaans about Vr: for the sonnes of Cham possest the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela; and Shela, Heber; of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Sonne of Shem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends. Euse. p. 10. 8.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his Sonnes.

Aram the fift and last Sonne of Shem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (saith Eusebius out of Iosephus) which Syrus liued before Moses was borne; the same which others call the sonne of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Prouince of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharaijm, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum fluuiorum, Syria compassed with two Riuers: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Iacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as these his owne words conuerted witnesse: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Arameeos & Arameos vocant; Those which we call Syrians (saith he) themselues call Arameenians and Arameans. Gen. 28. 2. see Gen 25. 20. also Deut. 23. 4. Iudg. 3. Paral. 1. 19. Psal. 59. Strabo l. 11

Against this opinion, that Aram the sonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not onely of those in Syria Inter-amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some reade, Genes. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) heere, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the Historie of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuels Posteritie could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Naharaijm, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomie calls Ancobaritis (so called from the Riuer Chaboras, which diuiding it runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharaijm (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Riuers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomie, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

The Sonnes of Aram were, { Vz or Hus, Hul, Gether, and Mesch or Mes.

Hieron in trad. Hebraic. Vz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that Citie, saith Iosephus and S. Hierome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliezer was the Founder therof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest sonne of Aram dwelt neere vnto his father, who inhabited the bodie of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adioyning to Arabia the Desart, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the Prophet Hieremie: Reioyce and be glad O Daughter of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Iordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adioyning to Basan, hauing Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Iordan West: hauing in it many Cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremie: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Iacob, saith Philo.

Hieremi. Lam. cap: 4. ver. 21. C. 25. v. 20.

Hul the second sonne of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third sonne, parent to the Acarnanians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disproue, though I see no reason why Gether should leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desart of Palmyrena, as farre as Euphrates, where Ptolomy setteth the Citie of Cholle.

Gether (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children feathers, to carrie them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwaies keepe the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Iunius: (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neere his brothers, in the bodie of Syria, and in the Prouince of Cassiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolomie placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Mesch the North part of Syria, betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neere the Mountaine Masius. The certaintie of those Plantations can no otherwise be knowne then by this probabilitie, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same Land about him: for hee wanted no scope of Territorie for himselfe and them; neyther then when the World was newlie planted, nor in many hundred yeres after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desart parts of the World, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and policie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselues within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also sought a Prouince apart, and to themselues; giuing to the Cities therein built their owne names, thereby to leaue their memorie to their Posteritie: the vse of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdaining the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nona Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessible to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap. 8. §. 7. Mes the fourth sonne is made the parent of the Mœonians: of whom something hath beene spoken alreadie. Arphaxad the third sonne of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Ioctan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth diuided.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THe many people which at the diuision (at Phaleghs birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at eyther. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeere after the Floud 101. and liued in all 239. yeeres, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it ſo many yeeres after the Floud, ere the children of Noah ſeuered themſelues. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in ſo few yeres as 101. (the time of Phalegs birth) ſo many people could be increaſed, Pererius giues this anſwere, that if 70. perſons of the Familie of Iacob increaſed to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeeres, (beſides women, children, and impotent perſons) how much more is it likely, that ſo ſoone after the Floud the children of Noah might in a ſhorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing receiued the bleſſing of God, Increaſe and multiplie, and fill the earth? What ſtrength this anſwere hath, let others iudge: for the children of Iſrael were 70. and had 215. yeres time: and the ſonnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeres of time, to the birth of Phalegh.

Others conceiue that Phalegh tooke that name after the diuiſion, in memorie thereof: as Ioſephus and Saint Auguſtine, who reaſon in this manner. If the diuiſion were at Phaleges death (which hapned in the yeere, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeeres before his birth) then was the diuiſion 38. yeres after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeres: in the 43. yeere of whoſe reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Aſſyrians, 80. yeres before this diuiſion (as this diuiſion is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chryſoſtome) then was the earth ſo peopled in all the Eaſt and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not beene found at any time ſince. For Ninus aſſociating to himſelfe Arieus King of Arabia a people who at that time (ſaith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis præſtabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, ſubdued many Cities in Armenia; receiued Barzanis into grace; then inuaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and ſeuen Children; vanquiſhed all thoſe Regions betweene Nilus and Tanais, the Ægyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Perſia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Cteſias) againſt Zoroaſter and others: and Zoroaſter on the other ſide, who made reſiſtance with 400000. proue it ſufficiently, that if the diuiſion had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuiſion at that time at all. For ſome of them were ſo ill ſatisfied with their partitions, as they ſought to be maſters of all, and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

Per. in Gen. l. 15. c. 10.

But for that conceit that if the diuiſion had beene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then ſufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled euery where at the verie inſtant, but by times and degrees. And ſurely whatſoeuer mens opinions haue beene heerein, yet it is certaine, that the diuiſion of tongues and of men muſt goe neere together with the ceaſing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off inſtantly vpon the confuſion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuiſion; and ſo neyther at the birth nor death of Pheleg: for Pheleg was borne in the yeere 101. after the Floud, which was the yeere that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or tenne yeeres after hee arriued, ſaith Beroſus.

Now if it be obiected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whoſe name ſignifieth diuiſion) muſt haue liued without a name, except the name had beene giuen him at the time of this confuſion and partition: to this obiection it may be anſwered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Iacob was called Iſrael after he had wreſtled with the Angell; Abraham was firſt Abram; and Edom Eſau; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuiſion had his firſt name vpon this accident changed, it is moſt probable.

And laſtly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chryſoſtome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giuing his ſonne the name of Phaleg, hee fore-told the diuiſion which followed: to this I ſay, I doe not finde that Heber deſerued any ſuch honour, if hee had thereupon ſo called his ſonne: for diuiſion and diſperſion followeth increaſe of people of neceſſitie; and this Propheſie (if any ſuch had beene) might alſo haue reference to the diuiſion, which afterwards fell amongſt the Hebrewes themſelues.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and Citie of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue proofe) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (whereupon Phelag tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IIII.
Of the sonnes of Ioctan, the other sonne of Heber.

The sonnes of Ioctan were:

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Iare, or Iaraah, or Ierath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Vzal, or Vzal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Hauilah, or Chauila, and
13. Iobab.

ALl those sonnes of Ioctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the world, or India, euen from the Riuer Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of those thirteen Sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall: And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest vnto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sonnes, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah. Concerning whose names, to auoid confusion, it is to be obserued, that among the sonnes of Chush, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Hauilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-childe by his wife Ketura. But Seba the sonne of Chush, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, we haue left in Arabia Fœlix: and Hauilah the son of Chush vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-childe of Abraham was (as some haue thought) the Father of the Sabaans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ, maketh mention. Primùm Sabæi; post hos sunt Passagardæ; prope verò hos sunt Tasci, The first are Sabeans: after these be Passagardæ; and neere these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gaue gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his sonne (while he yet liued) Eastward to the East-Countrey: heereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East-Countrey in respect of Iudæa, which also Ouid setteth vnder the Sun rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams sonnes seated themselues on the borders of Iudæa, I rather choose to leaue Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desart, where Ptolomie setteth a Citie of that name.

Gen. 25. v. 6.

Metam. lib. 1.

But Saba the sonne of Ioctan, the son of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which hee wrote in Greeke Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilis hos inter medios habitat q; Sabæus: In the middest of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, sayth this Dionysius.

†. V.
Of Ophir one of Ioctans sonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Salomon.

Ophir also was an Inhabitant of the East India, and (as Saint Hierome vndestands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull with gold, which are now knowne by the name of Moluccæ. Iosephus vnderstands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsulæ: of which there are two very notorious; Callecut, and Malacon. Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arias Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was here in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea, by others Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicles are these: And he couered the house with precious stones for beautie, and the gold was gold of Paruaim. Iunius takes this gold to bee the gold of Hauilah, remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Characene a Prouince of Susiana called Barbatia, so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Paruaim: from whence those Kings subiected by Dauid, brought this gold, with which they presented him, and which Dauid preserued for the enriching of the Temple. Gen. 2. 11. & 12. Plin. li. 6. c. 28.

But this fancie of Peru hath deceiued many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subiect of no further dispute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am that at least America hath none, no not any Citie, Village, or Mountaine so called. But when Francis Pisarro first discouered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriuing in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Countrie, and pointing with their hand athwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderstood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent ouer to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer since as diuers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Iesuite in his naturall and morall Historie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of Iochan, who as hee supposeth nauigated from the vtmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Iucatan is nothing else in the language of that Countrie, but [What is that] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) what aske you, or What say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountaynous Country on the South side of Trinidado & Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discouered, pointed to the Hills a farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as high Hills or Mountaynes. For at Paria begins that marualous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South, and so hath that Countrie euer since retained the name of Paria.

The same hapned among the English, which I sent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuile to inhabite Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Countrie, one of the Saluages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as, You weare good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Iland Trinidado: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that selfe place which the Sea incompassed, they answered, Caeri, which signifieth an Iland. And in this manner haue many places newlie discouered beene intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore wee must leaue Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout such an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it selfe (towards Persia) in Hauilah, now Susiana, and all alongst that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plentie is taken vp at the Philippines, certayne Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the Red Sea, (which was three yeeres in going and comming) it seemeth they went to the vttermost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede these that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finish that nauigation in two yeeres, and sometimes lesse; and Salomons ships went not aboue a tenth part of this our course from hence. But wee must consider, that they euermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vse of the Compasse was knowne, it was impossible to nauigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselues (had it not beene for the plentie of gold in the East India Ilands, farre aboue the mines of any one place of America) to saile euery yeere from the West part of America thither, and there to haue strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Ilands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Manilia. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off then Ophir in the East, to haue sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas hee had no coast to haue guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a fantasticall opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrie, whose Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaynes Solinus affirmeth to bee in Scythia Asiatica, in these wordes: Nam cùm auro & gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent vniuersa, alites ferocissimæ, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in gold, and rich stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaspi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to haue beene men with one eye onely, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus: & D. Siculus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleeue none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed, was first giuen them by reason that they vsed to weare a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Plinie, who speakes of such a Nation in the extreame North, at a place called Gisolitron, or the Caue of the Northeast winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall: That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not depriued of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and vnderstanding) they would content themselues with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselues to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be fained in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be auowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountains which are very rich & full of gold, inhabited onely with Tygres, Lyons, and other rauenous and cruell beasts: vnto which if any man ascend (except his strength bee very great) he shall be sure to finde the same warre, which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seeke to defend that mettall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselues or their yong-ones, they grow inraged and aduenturous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegartos, (which the Ægyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they diue for the pearle. And though the Alegartos know not the pearle, yet they finde sauour in the flesh and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

Placetus, lib. 6. Diod. Sicul. l. 18

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha and Sephar named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan: with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir past into the Ilands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Hauilah, it is meant by Hauilah in the East India, which tooke name of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan: but Hauilah, which Pison compasseth, was so called of Hauilah, the sonne of Chush, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Hauilah, as thou commest to Shur, which is before Ægypt. But that Saul euer made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of Ioctan, these three, Saba, Hauilah, & Ophir; though at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Masius or Mesh, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselues or their issues remooued into the East India, leauing the other other Families of Iokt'an, to fill the Countries of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue beene from Mesh vnto Sephar. And although S. Hieromie take Mesh to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountaine, Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Iudea, is neuer farther extended then into Persia. But Mesch is that part of the Mountaine of Masius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuer Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembred by Moses, Sipphara by Ptolomie, standing to the East of the Mountaine Masius; from whence Iokt'an hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beautie and riches thereof. But this was in processe of time.

The other fashion of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibilitie. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off then in those Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vsed: as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesse this place of Deuteronomie:) Because they hyred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharaijm, to curse thee: for Aram Naharaijm was Syria fluuiorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid. Verse 7. Cap. 23. ver. 4.

This plantation of the World after the floud doth best agree (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable coniecture; the Guides which I haue followed herein and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publike, other then the discouery of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vntrue reports left Honor without a Monument, and Vertue without Memorie: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkest forgetfulnesse ought to haue buryed, and couered ouer for euermore. And although the length and dissoluing Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and memory of the Worlds first planters after the floud (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot steps of Antiquitie (as appeares by that which hath beene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-growne: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phœnicia hath Zidon, to which Citie the eldest Sonne of Canaan gaue name; so hath Cilicia Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumæans, Libyans, Moores, and other Nations, haue preserued from the death of forgetfulnesse some signes of their first Founders and true Parents.

Chap. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Gouernment.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Gouernment vnder the eldest of Families to Regall, and from regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

IT followeth now to entreate how the World began to receiue Rule and Gouernment, which (while it had scarcitie of People) vnder-went no other Dominion then Paternitie and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes vsed both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Grauitie: the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouer-Gouernour ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleeued them as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Gracians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedæmonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, vt sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedæmonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were, so are they called Eldermen: and againe, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellássent Senatum; If reason and aduisement were not in old men, our Ancestors had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet wee doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernors or Counsailers of State, there is a signe that the first Gouernors were the Fathers of Families; and vnder them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietie, or proper power. The kindes of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Proprietie or Masterships: the correlatiue of the one is the subiect, of the other the slaue. Ad Cæsarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietas; Cæsar hath power ouer all; and euery man proprietie in his owne: and againe, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and euery man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seede seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouer-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, vtterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankinde began to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habituall) to constraine it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and tost to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisedome was seuered from power, and strength from charitie: Necessitie (which bindeth euery nature but the immortall) made both the Wise & Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouer-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion preuent it. For the mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mighty then themselues: the feeble fell vnder the forcible; and the equall from equall receiued equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better tryall, no lesse perilous then an vnindurable bondage.

Necessitas est firmum iudicium & immutabilis prouidentia potestas.

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselues to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Gouernment, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefes) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and corrosiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which inuented, and the same Reason which approued souereigne power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discerne her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, priuate affections in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance both good and euill.

For as wisedome in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not gouerned by any other lawes then the wils of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Loue sees one while too much, another while starke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeeres (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that gouernment which had had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an euen ballance ſupreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God eſtabliſhed in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancie of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were choſen for their vertues onely, ſo did they meaſure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (ſaith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iuſti erant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dij & dicti; Princes, becauſe they were iuſt and religious, were rightly accounted and called gods. De aureo ſæculo part. 1.

And though (ſpeaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be aſcribed to Reaſon and Neceſſitie; yet it was God himſelfe that firſt kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they ſaw that they could not liue and be preſerued without a Ruler and Conducter: God himſelfe by his eternall prouidence hauing ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the very Bees haue their Prince; the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order impoſed) watch for their owne ſafetie. The moſt High beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth ouer it whomſoeuer hee pleaſeth. By me (ſaith Wiſedome, ſpoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes rule, and it is God (ſaith Daniel) that ſetteth vp Kings, and taketh away Kings: and that this power is giuen from God, Chriſt himſelfe witneſſeth, ſpeaking to Pilate; Thou couldeſt haue no power at all againſt me, except it were giuen thee from aboue. Dan. 5. v. 21. Prou. 8. v. 15. Dan. 2. v. 21. Iohn 19. v. 11.

It was therefore by a threefold Iuſtice that the world hath beene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iuſtice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of Families gouerned their Children, and Nephewes, and Families, in which gouernment the Obedience was called naturall Pietie: Againe, by a Iuſtice diuine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God: and the Obedience hereunto was called Conſcience: And laſtly, by a Iuſtice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the Obedience to this we call Dutie. That by theſe three thoſe of the eldeſt times were commanded: and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is moſt euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne Children, inſtructed them in the ſeruice of God his Creator; as we reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of mankinde.

§. II.

Of the three commendable ſorts of Gouernment with their oppoſites: and of the degrees of humane ſocietie.

WHat other Policie was exerciſed, or State founded after ſuch time as mankinde was greatly multiplyed before the floud, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it ſeeme by probable coniecture, that the ſame was not without Kings in that firſt age: it being poſſible that many Princes of the Aegyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the generall floud: and very likely, that the cruell Oppreſſions in that Age proceeded from ſome tyrannie in Gouernment, or from ſome rougher forme of Rule, then the Paternall.

Beroſus aſcribeth the rule of the World in thoſe dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who maſtred (ſaith he) all Nations from the Sun-riſing to the Sun-ſet. But in the ſecond Age of the World, and after ſuch time as the rule of Elderſhip failed, three ſeuerall ſorts of Gouernment were in ſeuerall times eſtabliſhed among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People. Beroſ. lib. 1.

The firſt, the moſt ancient, moſt generall, and moſt approued, was the Gouernment of one, ruling by iuſt Lawes, called Monarchie: to which Tyrannie is oppoſed, being alſo a ſole and abſolute Rule, exerciſed according to the will of the Commander, without reſpect or obſeruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magiſtrate (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equitie: and of this condition ought euery Magiſtrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Iudges and Officers ſhalt thou make thee in thy Cities: And theſe ſhall iudge the people with righteous iudgement. Deut. 16. v. 18

The ſecond Gouernment is of diuers principall Perſons eſtabliſhed by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Ariſtocracie, or Optimatum poteſtas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vſurpation of a few great-ones) is oppoſed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The

The third is a State popular, (or Gouernment of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vniust ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously swaying the State: contrary to their owne Lawes and Ordinances. These three kindes of Gouernment are briefly expresst by Tholosanus; vnius, paucorum, & multorum, Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policie since the second increase of Mankinde, the same grew in this sort: First of all, euery Father, or eldest of the Family, gaue Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many Households (man by nature louing societie) ioyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicus; of the Greeke ιυς, which signifieth a House, or of the word (Via) because it hath diuers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a societie of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke πηγη, which signifieth a Fountaine: because many people (hauing their habitations not far asunder) dranke of one Spring or Streame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires answereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impietie began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselues from outrage, and to preserue such goods as they had gathered, they began to ioyne and set together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them first with bankes and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compasſed were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, Because wals were opposed against Enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safetie and defence: as also they were called Vrbes, ab orbe; because when they were to build a Citie, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Vrbs and Ciuitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Vrbs signified no other then the very wals and buildings, and Ciuitas was taken for the Citizens inhabiting therein: so called of Ciuis, and that, ab eo quòd multitudo coiuit, of comming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but onely such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the Citie, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of Subiects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subiects are also knowne. For euery Citizen is also a Subiect, but not euery Subiect a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no subiect; but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken à Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Megistos:) and so the Greekes call them Megistanes, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

Ethic. 5. The office and dutie of euery Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equitie; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient, and finall, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is
Rom. 13. 4. the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. Hee also
Ver. 1. teacheth in the same place; That euery soule ought to be subiect to the higher powers, because
2. they are by God ordained; and that whosoeuer resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and shall not onely be therefore subiect to the iudgement and con-
Ibid. v. 5. demnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted Authoritie, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any subiect therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or cruelrie: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselues to the power of Magistracie. Christ commanded that all dúe to Cæsar should

And ſo much did Saint Chryſoſtome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Gouernment, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) then that they ſhould be wanting: Præſtat Regem tyrannum habere, quàm nullum; Better a tyrannous King, then no King: to which alſo Tacitus ſubſcribeth: Præſtat (ſaith Tacitus in the firſt of his Hiſtorie) ſub malo principe eſſe quàm nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince then none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally preſuppoſed) then is there no libertie more ſafe, then to ſerue them: Neq; enim libertas tutior vlla eſt (ſaith Claudian) quàm Domino ſeruire bono: No libertie (ſaith he) more ſafe for vs then to be ſeruants to the vertuous. And certainly howſoeuer it may be diſputed, yet is it ſafer to liue vnder one Tyrant, then vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wiſe man that is cruell, then vnder the fooliſh and barbarous crueltie of the multitude. For as Ageſilaus anſwered a Citizen of Sparta that deſired an alteration of the Gouernment, That kinde of rule which a man would diſdaine in his owne houſe, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Laſtly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reaſon before remembred) many Houſholds ioyned themſelues together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: ſo when theſe Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and eſtabliſhed Lawes by conſent, aſſociating themſelues vnder one Gouernour, and Gouernment, they ſo ioyned, were called a Commonwealth: the ſame being ſometimes gouerned by Kings; ſometimes by Magiſtrates; ſometimes by the people themſelues.

§. III.

Of the good Gouernment of the firſt Kings.

NOw this firſt Age after the Floud, and after ſuch time as the people were increaſed, and the Families became ſtrong and diſperſed into ſeuerall parts of the World, was by ancient Hiſtorians called Golden: Ambition and Couetouſneſſe being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the ſeeds and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then ſought for no larger Territorie then themſelues could compaſſe and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then ſufficient to defend them from cold and tempeſt: they cared for no other delicacie of fare, or curioſitie of dyet, then to maintaine life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And ſure if we vnderſtand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient ſimplicitie of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truely be caſt vpon thoſe elder times: but if it be taken otherwiſe, then, whether the ſame may be attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none elſe) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both ſorts. And as the infancy of Empirie, (when Princes plaied their Prizes, and did then onely woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age: ſo may the beginning of all Princes times be truely called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then beſt purchaſed; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deſeruings haue commonly the leaſt impediments: and if euer Liberality ouerflow her banks & bounds, the ſame is then beſt warranted both by policie and example. But Age and Time doe not onely harden and ſhrinke the openeſt and moſt Iouiall hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne eſtates before their eyes, and (withall) perſwadeth them to compaſſionate themſeues. And although there be no Kings vnder the Sunne whoſe meanes are anſwerable vnto other mens deſires; yet ſuch as value all things by their owne reſpects, doe no ſooner finde their appetites vnanſwered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Reigne of euery King, ſo doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes be many: for our yonger yeeres are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, wee praiſe thoſe ſeaſons which our youth accompanied: and (indeede) the grieuous alterations in our ſelues, and the paines and diſeaſes which neuer part from vs but at the graue; make make the times seeme so differing and displeasing: especially the qualitie of mans nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how iust soeuer: Fit humana malignitatis vitio, vt semper vetera in laude, præsentia in fastidio sint; It comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignitie, that we alwayes extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errours of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of fore-passed times, forgetting this aduice of Salomon: Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better then these? for thou doest not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca; Maiores nostri questi sunt, & nos querimur, posteri querentur, euersos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi: Our Ancestors haue complained, we doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth reigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the vsuall discourses of Age and misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius? Noua res quandoq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus, quibus cæpit noua fuit & repentina: Whatsoeuer is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made Golden, this we may set downe for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crowns: so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of Subiects to Princes: so (relatiuely) he gaue the care and iustice of Kings to the Subiects; hauing respect, not onely to the Kings themselues, but euen to the meanest of his Creatures: Nunquàm particulari bono seruit omne bonum; The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one onely: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs, and by a generall loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience: For Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

Wisd. 6. 7.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobilitie: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authoritie began also other degrees and differences among Subiects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselues were chosen; vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobilitie, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeuour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glory or worldly Nobilitie necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobilitie denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue: were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ alijs notabilis. But after such time as the deserued Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his Posteritie, Saint Hierome iudged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobilitie, then that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessitie bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancestors. For if Nobilitie be Virtus & antiquæ diuitiæ; Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceede in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobilitie, then the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Viues) be a witnesse of vertue and well-doing: and Nobilitie (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Ladie, and other Saints: men, in whom there remaine but the dregs and vices of ancient Vertue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weedes. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountaines, Verus nobilis non nascitur sed fit.

if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertile producitur aliquando cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum, Out of fruitfull ground ariseth sometimes poysoning Hemlock: and out of barren soile precious Gold. Plin. in Ezech.

For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the Common-weale. For he is truely and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Vertue, seruing his Prince and Countrie, and being descended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our selues acquire by our Vertue and well deseruings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both naturall by Descent, and also personall; yet if Vertue be wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which hee calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Siluer or fauour: and these be indeede but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies wish they knew well how to wipe off againe. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our selues of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour, then Noblenesse, and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamitie is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is borne in sinne, of a Potshare body and barren minde? for (according to the same Father:) Dele fucum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronatæ nitoremgloriæ, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou maiest consider thy selfe nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Mytre, or glistering with Iewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe ouer, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping because he is borne, and repining, because he is borne to labour, and not to honour. Bernar. l. 2. de Consider. ad Eugen. Pap.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betweene it and dust: which if thou doest not beleeue (saith S. Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchres & Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily perswade thee by their owne example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seeme more Noble and beautifull then dust, this proceedeth not from the diuersitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour. Chrysostom. 2. de incomposita Dei natura. con. 5.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life; not in the fleshly Line:
For bloud is brute, but Gentric is Diuine. Phaer.

And howsoeuer the custome of the World haue made it good, that Honors be cast by birth vpon vnworthy Issues: yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his Fellow-Princes: There is an euill (saith he) that I haue seene vnder the Sun, as an errour that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth. Folly is set in great excellencie. Eccles. 10.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Floud that reigned like Soueraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue beene of iust authoritie.

THE first of all that reigned as Soueraigne Lord after the Floud was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others: or else in that hee was begotten by Chush, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time then some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoeuer, seeing Moses in expresse words calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chush, other mens coniectures to the contrary ought to haue no respect.

This Empirie of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to mee that Melanchton conceiued not amisse hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Authour of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirmes that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or seuere Gouernour, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authority. And therefore is hee in this respect also called a mightie Hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts and Theeues. But Saint Augustine vnderstands it otherwise, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoeuer this word (a mightie Hunter) be vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vsurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient Troupe, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Iothan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldaa about the Citie of Vr; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldaa, were no partners in the vnbeleeuing worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) did they retaine the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Heber remansit hac lingua; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vsed; yea, it was anciently and before the Floud the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Cœlestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Ægyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoeuer we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolue, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, then by violence of vsurpation.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

Berosus, and out of him Nauclerus with others, make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierome vpon Ose; and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli; qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos; There did Ninus reigne after the death of his Father Belus, who first gouerned in Babylon sixtie fiue yeeres. But it could not be vnknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clemens) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was maruailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnauerat; who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words doe not disproue that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Cæsar ouerthrew the liberty of the Romane Commonwealth, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperor: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authority ouer the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne Rule, as Cæsar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the floud (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-childe Richard the second, were Kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable then that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Niniue.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppreſt the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie, then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Niniue in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdaine thereof fall from his obedience, whom hee recouered againe by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

——Dicitur altam
*Cocti*libus muris cinxisse Semiramis Vrbem.

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did incloſe.

Further, where it is alleaged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercators arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might haue beene giuen to many other Kings aswell. For if wee may beleeue Iustine, then were Vexoris King of Ægypt, and Tanais of Scythia mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene them.

For wheras Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue inuaded & mastered those Cities so farre remoued from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; & both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answere. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, That euer Nimrod inuaded any of these Cities, but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the floud, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beliefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuagint cals Archad, and Epiphanius, Arphal; Eunius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others vnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to be one Citie: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, & Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome cals Achad: and so doe the Hebreiues also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Citie of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg, and Pagninus, Erec, this place Iunius vnderstands for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a Citie in Comagena called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third Citie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calimisis: of which Am. Marcellinus, Saint Hierome takes it for Selencia; Hieronymianus for Ctesiphon: others doe thinke it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the Land of Shinaar: so as in this Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldaa (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Cities farre remoued, and in seuerall Prouinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneua translation fauouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldaa, from Babylon in Ægypt: but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrods Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Citie at all to be found in Ægypt: Babylon of Ægypt being all one with the great Citie of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood Memphis the ancient Citie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath beene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrarie, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, wee may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

Lib. 23.

Cap. 6. vers. 2.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23.13. that Assur built Vr for the Chaldees.

NOw as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controuersie wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort hee conuerteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaaris; è terra hac processit in Assyriam vbi adificauit Niniuen; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: and hee went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answere the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter hee setteth downe the sonnes of Noah, in these words: Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Iapheth, vnto whom sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Iapheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noahs sonnes, be hee eldest or yongest: because hee was first to be spoken of: with whom (hauing last named him) hee proceedes and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japheths eldest sonne; and then speakes of Iauan and his sonnes: for of the rest reſt of that Familie he is ſilent. Anon after he numbreth the ſonnes of Ham, of which Chuſh was the eldeſt: and then the ſons of Chuſh and Mizraim, and afterward of Canaan; leauing Shem for the laſt, becauſe he would not diſioyne the Storie of the Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and ſo to Iacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the ſonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had beene againſt order; neither would Moſes haue paſt ouer ſo ſlightly the erection of the Aſſyrian Empire, in one of the ſonnes of Shem, if he had had any ſuch meaning: it being the ſtorie of Shems ſonnes which he moſt attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the reſt of the ſonnes of Chuſh, becauſe he founded the Babylonian and Aſſyrian Empire: and in the eleuenth Chapter he returnes to ſpeake of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with thoſe other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, ſo alſo in the eleuenth hee maketh no report of Shem, till ſuch time as he had finiſhed ſo much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the iſſue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Iſrael. And of Iunius opinion touching Aſſur, was Caluin: to which I conceiue that P. Commeſtor, in hiſtoria Scholaſtica, gaue an entrance, who after hee had deliuered this place in ſome other ſenſe, he vſeth theſe words: Vel intelligendum non eſt de Aſſur filio Sem, &c. ſed Aſſur (id eſt) Regnum Aſſyriorum inde egreſſum eſt, quod tempore Sarug proaui Abrahami factum eſt; (which is) Or elſe it is not to be vnderſtood of Aſſur the ſonne of Sem, &c. but Aſſur (that is, the Kingdome of the Aſſyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the differences in this ſort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the firſt Erecter of the Aſſyrian Empire, or the firſt Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Reſpecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beginning from Ninus, which is alſo true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Aſſur to be the ſonne of Nimrod: and ſo doth Methodius, and Viterbienſis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now laſtly Torniellus: who ſaith he tooke vpon him that name of Aſſur after he had beaten the Aſſyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his conqueſt in Africa: and that Aſſur was a common name to the Kings of Aſſyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Pſalme 81. Eſay 10. Oſe 5. &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the ſonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-biſhop of Mentz in the yeere of Chriſt 854. an ancient and learned Writer, vnderſtands this place with Commeſtor, or Commeſtor with him, agreeing in ſubſtance with that tranſlation of Iunius: to which words of Moſes he giueth this ſenſe: De hac terra Aſſyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Bel filij, Ninum condiderunt, vrbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Aſſyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, ſo named of Ninus the ſonne of Belus. On the contrarie Caluin obiecteth this place of Eſay: Behold the land of the Chaldæans; this was no people, Aſſur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderneſſe; then which there is no one place in the Scriptures that hath a greater diuerſitie in the tranſlation and vnderſtanding; inſomuch as Michael de Palatio vpon Eſay (though in all elſe very diligent) paſſeth it ouer. But Caluin ſeemeth hereby to inferre, that becauſe Aſſur founded the ſtate of the Chaldæans, therefore alſo Aſſur rather then Nimrod eſtabliſhed the Aſſyrian Empire, and built Niniue: contrary to the former tranſlation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes tranſlation) it may be gathered that Aſſur both founded and ruined this Eſtate or Citie of the Chaldæans, by Eſay remembred: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot truſt, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldæa, and that Eſtate, an example vnto thoſe Phœnicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldæa being of ſtrength, and carefully defended, was (notwithſtanding) by the Aſſyrians vtterly waſted and deſtroyed: whereby he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre (inuincible, as themſelues thought) ſhould alſo ſoone after be ouer-turned by the ſame Aſſyrians: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonoſor. And theſe be the words after Hierome: Ecce terra Chaldæorum, talis populus non fuit, Aſſur fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robuſtos eius, ſuffoderunt domos eius, poſuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is)

Torni l. Annal. ſacr. in Gen 10.

Iſay 23. 13.

Behold the Land of the Chaldaans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Geneua) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captiue, they vndermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldaeorum, & haec desolata est ab Assyrijs, quoniam murus eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus vnderstood: If thou goe ouer to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt haue no rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldaans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their wals fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus conuert it thus: Ecce terra Chasdym, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundauit eam nauibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriuerunt aedes eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldaans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Iunius in the place of ships sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneua, by the Barbarians. But this is vndoubted that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis; from the Macedonians, and other Gracians vnder the name of Cittim; also by the Ægyptians, the Chaldaans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Towne of the World most renowned. And (as it appeares in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Vr or Vrchoa in Chaldaea, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (euen that streame which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the east bankes of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandise by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Vr or Vrchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by Riuer and ouer Land they conueyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Vr of the Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldaea, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopt vp. Eius cursum vetustas aboleuit (saith Niger.) And Plinie: Locus vbi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum; Time hath worne away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probabilitie) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Vr; and (by Hecataeus) Camerina; by Ptolomie, Vrchoa: and by the Greekes, Chaldaeopolis, The Citie of Chaldaea: which the sonnes of Shem, vntill Abrahams time, inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be vnderstood, that Assur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Vr of Chaldaea, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God foreseeing, commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approued; because it was a Port Towne: and the Riuer so farre vp as this Citie of Vr was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desart were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldaea is now called Arachaldar, which signifieth desart Lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Ituraans) addeth, that they are of all other people the most saluage; calling them, Homines omnium maximi barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Iunius, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceiued (or any thing that I haue read) that Assur is in this place diuersly taken (as for the sonne of Sem, when he is ſpoken of as a Builder of Vr; and when as a Deſtroyer thereof, then for the Aſſyrian Nation) yet certainely the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumſtances ſeeme to enforce it. And ſo this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Aſſur (into which the moſt of the poſteritie of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were ſeparate for the Idolatrie of the Chuſites and Nimrodians, retired themſelues) hath nothing in it to proue that the ſame Aſſur built Niniue, or that the ſame Aſſur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Aſſur, who was the ſonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the ſonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the firſt notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the firſt that ſet vp a Statue or Image to be honored as god. Now if Aſſur muſt be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he muſt be if he founded Niniue, then all thoſe which ſeeke to giue him the honor thereof, doe him by a thouſand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Beſides, if this ſuppoſed Aſſur whom they make the Founder of Niniue (and ſo the ſonne of Belus) were any other, and not the ſame with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainely he was very vnworthy and obſcure, and not like to be the Founder of ſuch an Empire and ſuch a Citie, if no man haue vouchſafed to leaue to poſteritie his expulſion thence, and how he loſt that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whoſe acts and conqueſts are ſo largely written, and (according to my apprehenſion) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found beſt agreeing to Scripture and to Reaſon, and beſt agreeing with the ſtorie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the firſt workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moſes; and that theſe workes being finiſhed within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and ſet in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the ſame ſtreame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-childe Ninus afterward amplified and finiſhed, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to paſſe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundreſſe of the Citie which ſhe onely finiſhed: ſo alſo Ninus of Niniue: Quam quidem Babylonem potuit inſtaurare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, ſaith S. Auguſtine. For ſo did Nabuchodonoſor vaunt himſelfe to bee the Founder of Babylon alſo, becauſe he built vp againe ſome part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the Riuer: which worke of his ſtood till Alexanders time, whereupon hee vanted thus: Is not this great Babel which I haue built? Dan. 4. 27.

§. IIII.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

BVt to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moſes, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium; and Iulius Africanus ſurnamed Saturne) was the eſtabliſher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning conſiſted of thoſe 4. Cities before remembred, Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Aſſyria; & in Aſſyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Niniue, Rehoboth, Celah, and Reſen. And ſeeing that hee ſpent much time in building Babel it ſelfe and thoſe adioyning, and that his trauailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (ſuch as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Niniue, and the other Cities of Aſſyria which he builded (conſidered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his Succeſſors in many yeeres after: to whoſe vndertakings time had giuen ſo great an increaſe of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning ſo great an aduancement and encouragement: in whoſe time (ſaith Glycas) all theſe Nations were called Meropes, à ſermonis linguarum terræq; diuiſione; By reaſon that the earth and the ſpeech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, ſucceeded Nimrod, after hee had reigned 114. yeeres; of whoſe acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he ſpent much of his time in diſ-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all thoſe great Fennes and ouer-flowne Mariſhes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or conqueſts there is no report, other then of his begun enterpriſe againſt Sabatius King of Armenia, and thoſe parts of Scythia which Beroſus calls Scythia Saga, whoſe ſonne and ſucceſſor Barzanes became ſubiect and Tributarie to Ninus, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begunne.

§. V.

§. V.

That we are not to maruaile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Ægypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold, (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princesse liberall and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertayners many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisedome ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receiue all those helps and supplyes, which they eyther want or wish for: so as euery Leader of a troupe (after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they possest, and gouerned by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceiued, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankinde straggled abroad like beasts in a Desart; but that by agreement they disposed themselues, & vndertooke to inhabite all the knowne parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus time, would not haue beene possest in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were; neyther did those that were sent, and trauelled far off (order being the true parent of prosperous successe) vndertake so difficult enterprizes without a Conducter or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened euery humor that aspired. Thirdlie, Necessitie resolued all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enioy the harueſt of their owne Trauailes: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselues against forcible violence: nor those which sought after any proportion of greatnesse, eyther possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vndertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the son of Belus) made it apparent: for he found euery where Kings and Monarchies, what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him Souer. ignitie and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also raysed themselues to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successor) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatius I take to be the same, which Iustine cals Tanais; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had beene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reineccius all one with the great Sesostris, that liued certaine Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

See more of this, l. 2. of this first Part, cap. 2. §. 6.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affine vnto it.

WHence this second King and Successour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath beene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) giuen by Ninus, then assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrillus against Iulian cals the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to bee called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis giue that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satrapæ: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as infinitie) those voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belpheger, Beelphegor, Belsebub, and Beelsephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean conuert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militiæ, Chiefe in the Warre; though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum, In honour of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to haue the same signification: Hierom in Ose. 2. and say th, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memorie of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lyranus) came Idola- Lyr. in Explan. Salom. c. 11. trie, and the first vse of Images into the World. Isidore doth interprete Bel by Vetus, old Ysid. l. 8. c. 11. or ancient; adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punicke or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God. Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly; and Iosephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the opinion Hieron. in Osee. c. 4. & 9. of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel soundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies or Hornets:) by which name (notwithstanding) the Iewes expresse the Prince of Deuils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouthes. For although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be iustly to be vsed towards God; yet in respect that the same was giuen to Idols, God both hated it and forbad it. And the vsing of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tanquam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belpheger, and Belsephon, Belsephon is expounded out of Facius, Dominus specula vel custodia: The Lord of the Watch-Towre, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpeor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Denudauit; and therefore the word ioyned expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the Sonne Iupiter, and the Grand-childe Hercules. Saturni dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regum qui vrbes condiderunt senissimi; primogeniti eorum Ioues & Iunones; Hercules verò nepotes eorum fortissimi; The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnes; their first-borne Iupiters and Iunoes; their valiant Nephewes Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Viues) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Ninus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Iupiter Babylonius, whom the Ægyptians (transported by the Dreames of their Antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Iupiter Belus, who was Father to Ægyptus. They adde, that this Belus carrying a Colonie to the Riuer of Euphrates, there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Ægyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom wee speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Ægyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, hee was the most ancient Belus, and the Inuentour of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Ægyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it did remaine in his time.

Of the Sepulcher of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Ouer the Riuer (saith he) there are Gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tombe, which Xerxes brake vp, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramis made of Bricke, a furlong high, and on euery side it had a furlong in breadth. It appeares by Cyril against Iulian, that hee obtained diuine worship yet liuing: Strabo l. 3. f. 3.

liuing: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus:) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Dei nomen accepisse: perseuerarunt igitur Assyrij, & finitimæ illis gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was euer honoured by their subiects with title of Deitie, (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations haue persevered, sacrificing to him. Euen Arius also, whom Suidas cals Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninyas, was made an Idoll-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninus) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Caucasus of the stocke of Iapheth slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus farre Suidas. Neither is it vnlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statua were first erected without diuine worship, onely in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiueth; and so afterward the Deuill crept into those woodden and brazen carcasses, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt homines fuerant, & pro vnius cuiusq; vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud suos post mortem cœperunt: sed (Dæmonibus persuadentibus) quos illis pro sua memoria honorauerunt, minores Deos existimarunt: adiecta verò magis exornanda accesserunt Poetarum figmenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and euery one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to bee honoured of his owne. But at length (the Deuils perswading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregorie: Gentilitas (saith he) inuentrix & caput est imaginum; Gentilisme is the inuentresse and ground of Images: and Ambrose; Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantus. Et verentur (saith Lactantius) ne religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adorent; They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shift this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workemanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfie it selfe with the distinction of Doulia and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not onely no where warranted, but expresly in many places forbidden, and cursed the Practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any grauen image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remoue, weed it, or by feare, or by any perswasions lead the harts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction then these? Take therefore good heed to your selues (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that yee corrupt not your selues, and make you a grauen Image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likenesse of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no grauen Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Booke of Wisedome, That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neyther shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the liuing God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil; Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts thoughts and mindes, how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder the grauer, Pensill of a Painter, or the rustie Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Grauer?

For as this dishonour to the Infinite and incomprehensible God began in Chaldea so did the Deuill transport and spred this invention into all the Regions adioyning, and into Ægypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. yeeres; obseruing the Law of Numa, who thought it impietie to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Grecians, (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of their gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vtterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicant, genu ponitis illa adorant, & cùm hæc sufficiant, fabros quibus illa fecere contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto with bended knees, those they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handi-craftsmen that made them: which also Serulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at: Aug. de civ. l. 4. c. 31.

Heu miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro
Religiosa sibi sculpunt simulachra suumq;
Factorem fugiunt, & quæ fecere verentur.
Quis furor est? quæ tanta animos dementia ludit?
Vt volucrem, turpemq; bouem, torumq; Draconem,
Semi-hominemq; canem supplex homo prouus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens mindes? that man should vgly shapes adore,
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile
Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Iewes were corrupted in Ægypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorne the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inueighed against Images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witnesse, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus neuer taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impietie to represent immortall natures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixt Booke, de præparatione Euangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might bee remembred that witnesse the disdaine which the Heathen themselues had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hospinian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truely sayd, Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt, All ill examples haue sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statua and Images, but in memorie of such remarkeable men, as had deserued best of their Countries and Common-wealths; Effigies hominum (saith Plinie) non solebant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuitatem verentium: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to bee perpetually remembred. And though of the more ancient Papists, some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarū, vt per ea discerent homines Deū inuisibilē cognoscere: Images (say they, & so before the the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the inuisible God: in which vnderstanding perhaps they no otherwise esteemed them then pictures indeed, yet as that of Baal or Bel set vp in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most renerenced Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were apptopriate to God himselfe) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks & stones, and painted Canuases (called the pictures of Christ, our Ladie, and others) reuerenced by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but endeuored to haue life, motion, and vnderstanding. On these stocks we call (saith the Booke of Wisedome) when we passe through the raging waues, an these stockes more rotten then the Ship that carrieth vs.

This Heathen inuention of Images became so fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dij Consentes, seu maiorum gentium, selecti, Patrij, insigniores, dij medij, Consulting gods, or gods of the mightiest Nobilitie, select gods, Patrian gods of marke, and common gods (which the Romanes called Mediocrumi) dij infimi, and terrestriall Heroes, and multitudes of other gods: of which Saint Augustine hath made large mention in his Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable sorts and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angell mooued I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the vnknowne God, which stood with the same title and dedication euen to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discerne the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth euery man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Deuill had so manie yeeres led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in generall, or that euerie Nation had some one which tooke particular and singular care of them, as Iupiter in Creete, Isis in Aegypt, in Athens Minerua, in Samos Iuno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but euery Citie, and almost euery Family had a god a-part. For as it is written in the second of Kings: the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Ashima, and the Anins made Nibhaz and Tarrak, and the Sepharuaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainely hath the Prophet Esay derided? Men cut downe Trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make readie their meate, and warme themselues by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god, an Idoll, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heart from vnderstanding; It is therefore safest for a Christian to beleeue the Commandements of God so direct against Idolatrie, to beleeue the Prophets, and to beleeue S. Paul: who speaketh thus plainely and feelingly, My beloued, flye from Idolatrie, I speake as vnto them which haue vnderstanding, iudge ye what I say.

§. VIII.

Of the Warres of Ninus: and lastly of his Warre against Zoroaster.

VNto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatrie, the first that iniuriously inuaded his Neighbor Princes, and the first that without shame or feare committed adulterie in publique. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose Storie is gathered out of Prophane Authors) I finde nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus set out and commented vpon by Annius, hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as Chrytaus noteth) to the vnderstanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnasseus, and others: yet Lodouicus Viues, B. Rhenanus, and others after them haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; prouing directly that it cannot be the same Berosus which liued in Alexanders time, cited by Athenaeus and Iosephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefely, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian & Assyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Ascatades, and to the times of Iosua. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine Papers, or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errours.

Ctesias of Cnidus (a Citie adioyning to Halicarnassus) who liued together with Cyrus the yonger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his Historie out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farre vpwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Storie of Cyrus the yonger, Xenophon approueth him in some things, and Athenaeus, Pausanias and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes ces with whom he liued, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoeuer his reports were, times haue consumed his workes, sauing some very few excerptions lately published.

And therefore in things vncertaine, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of iudgement, I will passe ouer the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can expresse them. S. Augustine affirmes that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wanne it all, saue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entred into a straight league of amitie, because he commanded many people, and was his Kinsman, and a Chusite, and the neerest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was vpon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because hee inuaded it on the sodaine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himselfe that way toward the East; but that euer he commanded the lesser Asia, I doe not beleeue, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third Warre was against Pharnus, King of the Medes, whome it is sayd that he ouerthrew, and cruelly murthered with his seuen Children, though others affirme that they all died in one battaile against him. Whether he inuaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is vncertaine. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill successe in the first, hee returned, and set the worke of Ninive forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horse, and 10000. sixe hundred Chariots: being encountred by Zoroaster with foure hundred thousand. But Ninus preuayling, and Zoroaster being slaine, hee entred farther into the Countrie, and besieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Bactra or Bactrion (saith Stephanus:) which by a passage found, and an assault giuen by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) hee entred and possest. Vpon this occasion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her person and externall beautie, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) hee tooke her from her husband, whose eyes he threatned to thrust out if hee refused to consent. Hee therefore yeelding to the passion of loue in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himselfe, by the strong perswasions of shame and dishonour, cast himselfe head-long into the water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magick Arts: and of the diuers kinds of Magicke.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

ZOroaster King of the Bactrians, Vincentius supposeth to be Cham the sonne of Noah: A fancie of little probabilitie. For Cham was the Paternall Ancester of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose sonne was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, deuised by some wicked Knaue, & so intituled: of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the inuention of Magicke to Cham the sonne of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholasticall Historie: which Art (saith he) with the 7. liberall Sciences he writ in 14. Pillers: seuen of which were made of brasse, to resist the defacing by the waters of the Floud; and 7. of bricke against the iniurie of fire. There was also another deuised discourse, which went vnder title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somwhat like vnto this of Comestor. These be *Cassian*ᵒ words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibᵘ istis & sacrilegis fuit artibᵘ infectus, sciens, nullum se posse super hijs memorialem librum in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre iusto, &c. Cham (the sonne of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remayne with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be grauen in metall and hard stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to haue laught at his birth, when all other children weepe; which presaged the great knowledge which afterward he attayned vnto: being taken for the Inuenter of naturall Magicke and other Arts; for the Corrupter, saith Plinie and Iustine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natiuities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and mineralls, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldaa is also made the Inuenter. I rather thinke that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his sonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned heerein then any other in that age, if hee exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisedome of after-times in this, that hee knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselues, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisedome, Which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and reneweth all.

Wisd. c. 7.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouer-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie findes of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the middest of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Scalig. in Euseb.

Ioseph. lib. 1. Antiq. c. 4.

Againe, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandring Starres, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this Art had been inuented by Zoroaster, hee could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne lifetime; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, he might adde somewhat to this kinde of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse iangling about the word and arte of Magick. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was giuen: which by Hermodorus & Dinon seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of arte, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldaan, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who liued in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hostianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past threescore and eighteene yeres. Suidas remembreth a fift, called Persomedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the sonne of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemistbius or Pletho, Ficinus and Steuchius, make him a Chaldean. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainely, that the Author of them was a Chaldaan by Nation, though the word (Chaldaan) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldai and Magi diuers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldaan both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldaan tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi & they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, hee saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris, & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

NOw for Magicke it ſelfe; which Arte (ſaith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few vnderſtand, and many reprehend; Et ſicut Canes ignotos ſemper allatrant; As Dogs barke at thoſe they know not: ſo they condemne and hate the things they vnderſtand not: I think it not amiſſe (leauing Ninus for a while) to ſpeake ſomewhat thereof. Pic. Mir. fo. 81.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) becauſe of Simon Magus: who being indeed, not Magus, but Goës, (that is) familiar with euill ſpirits, vſurped that title. For Magicke, Coniuring, and Witcherie, are farre differing Arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant ſcoffeth thereat. For Nero (ſaith Plinie) who had the moſt excellent Magicians of the Eaſt ſent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found the arte after long ſtudie and labour altogether ridiculous. Plin. l. 30. hiſt. Nat.

Magus is a Perſian word primitiuely, whereby is expreſt ſuch a one as is altogether conuerſant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Arte of Magicke is the Arte of worſhipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epiſtles expounding the word (μαγος) ſaith, that the Perſians called their gods μαγους: whence hee addeth that Magus is either ἀγαθοειδὴς θεὸς or θεραπευτὴς θεῶν (that is) that Magus is a name ſometime of him that is a God by nature; ſometimes of him that is in the ſeruice of God: in which latter ſenſe it is taken, Math. 2. v. 1. And this is the firſt and higheſt kinde: which Piccolominie calleth diuine Magicke: and theſe did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or Wiſe men: For, the feare and worſhip of God is the beginning of knowledge. Theſe Wiſemen the Greekes call Philoſophers: the Indians, Brachmans: which name they ſomewhat neerely retaine to this day, calling their Prieſts Bramines; among the Ægyptians they were termed Prieſts; with the Hebrewes they were called Cabaliſtes, Prophets, Scribes, and Phariſees: amongſt the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldæans: and among the Perſians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (ſpeaking of Hoſtanes, one of the ancient Magicians) vſeth theſe words: Et verum Deum merita maieſtate proſequitur, & Angelos miniſtros Dei, ſed veri, eius veneration nouit aſſiſtere. Idem dæmonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos; Soſthenes (for ſo M. Fœlix calleth him, not Hoſtanes) aſcribeth the due maieſtie to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are miniſters and meſſengers which attend the worſhip of the true God. He alſo hath deliuered that there are Deuils earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankinde. Piccol. de Deſin. Prouerb 1:7. Iohn Hiero. Lmſchot. In octauio Minutij Fœlicis cū Arnobio. p. 460

His Maieſtie alſo in his firſt Booke of Dæmonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Perſian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine and heauenlie ſciences; but vniuſtly ſo called, becauſe the Chaldæans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is alſo right which His Maieſtie auoweth, that vnder the name of Magicke all other vnlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Maieſtie diſtinguiſh it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the reſt: of all which he hath written largely and moſt learnedly. For the Magicke which His Maieſtie condemneth, is of that kinde whereof the Deuill is a partie. Daniel in his ſecond chapter nameth foure kindes of thoſe wiſe men: Arioli, Magi, Maleſici, and Chaldæi. Arioli the olde Latine tranſlation calleth Sophiſtas: Vatablus and Panignius, Genethliacos, or Phyſicos, or Philoſophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturaliſts: Nempè ſunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philoſophi apud Græcos (ſcilicet) diuinarum humanarumq; rerum ſcientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the ſame with the Barbarians, as the Philoſophers are with the Gracians (that is) men that profeſſe the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke and the Engliſh call them Inchanters; Iunius, Magicians; Caſtalion, Coniecturers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The wiſe men of Babel. Dæmonolog. l. 2. cap. 2.

The ſecond ſort Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our Engliſh, call Aſtrologers; Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kinde are Maleſici, or Veneſici; in Hierome, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poyſoners: in Iunius, Praſtigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in Engliſh.

That Witches are alſo rightly ſo called Veneſici, or Poyſoners; and that indeede there is a kinde of Maleſici, which without any Arte of Magicke or Necromancie vſe the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischiefe, His Maestie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldæans: who took vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euents: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magicke, hauing chiefly sought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfet the highest and most noblest part of it, yet so as they haue also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magicke was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kindes of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Iudæus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magicke or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heauenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldæa: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. *Ioseph*us reporteth of Abraham, that hee instructed the Ægyptians in Arithmeticke and Astronomie, who before Abrahams comming vnto them knew none of these sciences.

De vit. sanct. Glyc. Annal. fol 180.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garsias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus Chaldæos primùm, deinde Phœnices, demum Ægyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & diuina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirme, that Abraham the holyest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldæans, then the Phœnicians; lastly, the Ægyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magicke contayneth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humane vse, Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Vertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa noua, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyanæus remembred by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians, Thespian: among the Ægyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Petrus Aponensis. The Magicke which these men profest is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, vt inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant; Magicke is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kindes which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the Vniuersall: he beleeueth of the * Trinitie, which he could not inuestigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approoueth the immortalitie of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Loue, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Psellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated.

* Toto in mundo lucet Trias, cuius Monas est princeps. Cuncta namq; perfecit pater, & menti tradidit secunda. Psel & Ficin. De præp. Euāg. lib. 1. cap 7.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phœnicians, vsing Zoroasters owne wordes: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, sibiipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina iustitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ vnicus inuentor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God the first incorruptible, euerlasting, vnbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the onely inuenter thereof.

Lib 2. fol. 26.

Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisedome of the Chaldæans, doth distinguish those wise men men into fiue orders, (to wit) Chaſcedim, or Chaldæans: Aſaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he tranſlates Arioli, or Sophiſts) Mechaſphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poyſoners; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruſpices, or Diuiners.

Chaſcedim were thoſe which had the name of Chaldæans, which were Aſtronomers: Hij cælorum motus diligentiſſimè ſpectârunt; Theſe did moſt diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham deſcribeth.

Aſaphim were in the old Latine tranſlation called Philoſophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam diuinarum quàm humanarum rerum cauſis Philoſophati ſunt; Who diſcourſed of the cauſes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the ſonne of Beor) to be the firſt: but Laertius aſcribeth the inuention of this arte to Zoroaſtres the Perſian. Laert. l. 1.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Diſciples (ſaith Saint Auguſtine, Plinie, and Iuſtine) of another Zoroaſtres: who corrupted the admirable wiſedome of the Magi, which hee receiued from his Anceſters.

Mecaſphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are thoſe of which we haue ſpoken alreadie out of His Maieſties booke of Dæmonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruſpices (after Saint Hierome) which diuine from the entrailes of beaſts ſlaine for ſacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderſtand Augures, who diuine by the flying, ſinging, or feeding of birds.

By this diſtinction wee may perceiue the difference betweene thoſe wiſe men which the Kings of Babylon entertayned; and that the name and profeſſion of the Magi among the ancient Perſians was moſt honeſt. For as Peucer truely obſerueth, Præerant religioni Perſicæ, vt in populo Dei Leuitæ, ſtudijſq; veræ Philoſophiæ dediti erant: nec quiſquam Rex Perſarum poterat eſſe, qui non antea Magorum diſciplinam ſcientiamq; percepiſſet; The Magi (ſaith he) were the chiefe Miniſters of the Perſian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were giuen to the ſtudies of true Philoſophie: neither could any be King of the Perſians, who had not firſt beene exerciſed in the myſteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senenſis in the defence of Origen againſt Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kindes of Magicke, his owne words are theſe: Et ne quem moueant præmiſſa Polychronij & Theophili teſtimonia, ſciendum eſt duplicem eſſe Magiam; alteram vbiq; ab Origine damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum dæmonibus inita aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ ad practicen naturalis philoſophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium; That the teſtimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (ſaith he) may not moue any man, it is to be vnderſtood that Magicke is of two ſorts, the one euery where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truely or ſeemingly) by couenants made with Deuills; the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practicke part of naturall Philoſophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and ſuffering reciprocally. Peucer. de Diuinat. in 2. de mag. fol. 135. 136. Bibl. l. 6. fol. 424.

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the firſt of his Commentaries vppon Daniel: where conſidering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene theſe foure kindes of wiſe Men formerly remembred, hee vſeth this diſtinction: Quos nos hariolos; cæteri vanos (id eſt) incantatores interpretati ſunt, videntur mihi eſſe qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de ſingulis philoſophantur; malefici, qui ſanguine vtuntur & victimis, & ſæpe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porrò in Chaldæis Genethliacos ſignificari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Conſuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem ſuam, eo quòd ſint Philoſophi Chaldæorum: & ad artis huius ſcientiam Reges quoq; & Principes eiuſdem gentis omnia faciunt; vnde & in natiuitate Domini Saluatoris ipſi primùm ortum eius intellexerunt, & venientes ſanctam Bethlehem adorauerunt puerum, ſtella deſuper oſtendente; They whom wee call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, ſeeme to mee ſuch as performe things by wordes; Magicians, ſuch as handle euery thing philoſophically; Witches, that vſe bloud and ſacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldæans I take them to bee ſignified by the name of Comecturers vpon natiuities, whom the vulgar call Machematicians. But common cuſtome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwiſe reputed in their owne Nation: for they are the Philoſophers of the Chaldæans: yea Kings and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art: whence at the natiuitie of the Lord our Sauiour they firſt of all vnderſtood his birth, and comming vnto holy Bethlehem did worſhip the Childe: the Starre from aboue ſhewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great great difference betweene the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facto vtitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcunq; That he is called a Magician now-adaies, who hauing entred league with the Diuell, vseth his helpe to any matter: yet (as our Sauiour said of Diuorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magicke is of the wisedome of Nature; other Arts which vndergoe that title, were inuented by the fulshood, subtlety, & enuy of the Deuill. In the latter there is no other doctrine, then the vse of certaine ceremonies, Per malâ fidem; By an euill faith: in the former no other ill, then the inuestigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath giuen to his creatures, and how fitlie to apply things that worke, to things that suffer. And though by the Iewes those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, & Diuines, which came to worship our Sauior Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason then common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custome (saith S. Hierome) vnderstandeth Witches vnder the name of Magicians: And antiquitie (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur expauescis Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Euangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith Ficinus) why doubtest thou to vse the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospell, which doth not signifie a witch or Coniurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that studie & profession, but onely idle ignorance: the parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ re vera opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratione dæmonum naturas ipsas vel coniungentium, vel commiscentium, vel aliter ad operandũ expedientium facta sunt, opera dæmonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus huiusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi impropriè vocant: The marueilousnesse of some workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath beene the cause of this slander: but because these workes haue beene done by procurement of Deuils, ioyning the natures together or mingling them, or howsoeuer fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the workes of the Deuils by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magicke, which men call very improperly Necromancie.

Hieron. in Daniel. Pet. Mar. Loc. Mar. Ficin. par. prim. fol. 573. Gul. Parisiẽ. de Lege, cap 14.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by vnderstanding (saith hee) the vttermost actiuitie of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Diuinitie of Christ: for otherwise (to vse his owne words) ignoratis terminis potentiæ & virtutis rerum naturaliũ fiat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, wee must needs doubt whether those verie workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall meanes: after which hee goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hæreticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adiuuari nos in cognoscenda diuinitate Christi: Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truely and Catholikely, that by such Magicke wee are furthered in knowing the Diuinitie of Christ. And seeing the Iewes and others the enemies of Christian Religion, doe impudently and impiously obiect, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not aboue Nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeeres fuller of knowledge then any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason auow, that the vttermost of Natures workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselues, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencill, and by a power infinitely supreme and diuine; and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either conuerted or put to silence.

Fol. 80.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to be condemned: though the Deuill here, as in other kindes hath sought to obtrude euill things, vnder the name and colour of good things.

SEeing therfore it is confessed by all of vnderstanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other then, Diuinorum cultor & interpres: A studious obseruer & expounder of diuine things: and the Art of it selfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magicke) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophia absoluta consummatio; Then the absolute perfection of natural Philosophie: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no no way ſorteth with wiſe and learned men, promiſcuè and without difference & diſtinction, to confound lawful & praiſe-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to vſe S. Pauls words) with thoſe beggerly rudiments, which the Diuell hath ſhuffled in, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceleſſe men. For if we condemne naturall Magicke, or the wiſedome of Nature, becauſe the Diuell (who knoweth more then any man) doth alſo teach Witches and Poyſoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we by the ſame rule condemne the Phyſician, and the Art of healing. For the Diuell alſo in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for ſuch and ſuch diſeaſes. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Diuell from the beginning hath ſought to thruſt himſelfe into the ſame imployment among the Miniſters and Seruants of God, changing himſelfe for that purpoſe into an Angell of Light. Hee hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thruſt in his Prophets among thoſe of the true God; hee hath corrupted the Art of Aſtrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Starres, teaching men to eſteeme them as gods, and not as inſtruments. And (as Bunting obſerueth) it is true, that iudiciall Aſtrologie is corrupted with many ſuperſtitions: but the abuſe of the thing takes not away the Art; conſidering that heauenly bodies (as euen generall experience ſheweth) haue and exerciſe their operation vpon the inferiour. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moiſten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Againe, the Planets, as they haue ſeuerall and proper names, ſo haue they ſeuerall and proper vertues: the Starres doe alſo differ in beautie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God giuen alſo their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starres, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celeſtiall influences, the Diuell ceaſeth not to ſhuffle in his Superſtitions: and ſo to the knowledge of the ſecret vertues of Nature hath he faſtened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and Incantations; and taught men to beleeue in the ſtrength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his owne with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminiſh the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Pſal. 147.

Moreouer, he was neuer ignorant, that both the wiſe and the ſimple obſerue when the Sea-birds forſake the ſhores and flye into the Land, that commonly ſome great ſtorme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crowes and bathing of Ducks foreſhew raine: for they feele the Ayre moiſtened in their Quils. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Euen the Storke in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Mankinde, working vpon theſe as vpon the reſt of Gods creatures, long time abuſed the Heathen by teaching them to obſerue the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill ſucceſſe in the Warre: and (withall) to looke into their entrailes for the ſame, as if God had written the ſecrets of vnſearchable prouidence in the Liuers and bowels of birds and beaſts. Againe, becauſe it pleaſed God ſometimes by Dreames, not onely to warne and teach his Prophets and Apoſtles, but Heathen Princes alſo; as Abimelech to reſtore Sara to Abraham; becauſe hee admoniſhed Ioſeph, and by Dreame informed Iacob, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the Eaſt, and others. For as it is remembred in Iob: In Dreames and Viſions of the night when ſleepe falleth vpon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cauſe man to returne from his enterprize: therefore, I ſay, doth the Diuell alſo practiſe his Diuinations by Dreames, or (after Pariſienſis) diuinitatis imitationes, his mocke-diuinitie. This in the end grew ſo common, as Ariſtides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of thoſe of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconuenience hereof, becauſe all dreames (without diſtinction of cauſes) were drawne to Diuination, forbad the ſame by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis ſomnijs occultam aliquam artem diuinandi) it may appeare. Likewiſe by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. ſeducing Dreamers were ordered to be ſlaine. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dreame for two grieuous diſeaſes that oppreſt him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolomies poiſoned wound; nor that which Saint Auguſtine reporteth of a Millaneiſe, whoſe ſonne (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dreame where the Acquittance lay to diſcharge it: that that of Astyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, forasmuch as the cause is not in our selues, this place denieth dispute.

§. IIII.

That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

BVt it may be obiected, that if such Diuinations as the Heathens commonly vsed were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange Reuelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hastie sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldæa, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such kind of people God himselfe commanded to be slaine? To this, diuers answeres may be giuen. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldæans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the King, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (said the Chaldæans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Euer-liuing God.

Deu. 13. & 18. Leuit. 20.

Secondly, it may be coniectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselues in any euill or vnlawfull Arts, but were meerely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had beene taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldæans, others Magi or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that iudgement, because it was vniust. For howsoeuer those men might deserue punishment for the practice of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Diuell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture euery where of good with euill, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleanesse and purity: The good, The truth, The puritie in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Diuell in the Image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemoth, Iupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleeue the most ancient and religious Historians) from obseruing the motions and natures of heauenly bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heauen, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures.

Euseb. ex Aristot. & Polybi.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other vtmost vertues, sometimes taught by the Diuell, and applyed by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable ends, can neuer terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the vsing of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Diuell betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of Dreames; so farre as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make vse of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as signes of good or euill successe) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crowes against Raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be giuen. For if wee confound Arts with the abuſe of them, we ſhall not onely condemne all honeſt Trades and enterchange among men (for there are that deceiue in all profeſſions) but we ſhall in a ſhort time bury in forgetfulneſſe all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obſcure and couer it ouer with a moſt ſcornefull and beggerly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) we ſhould ſhew our ſelues ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaq; lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Vnthankfull we ſhould ſhew our ſelues towards thoſe, who with paines and care haue diſcouered vnto vs light in this light.

Indeed not onely theſe naturall knowledges are condemned by thoſe that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks alſo and Profeſſors thereof: though thoſe that are excellently learned iudge of it in this ſort: In ſpeculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni ſcibili quæritur, elucet; non modò remota ſimilitudine, ſed fulgida quadam propinquitate: In the Glaſſe of the Mathematickes that Truth doth ſhine, which is ſought in euery kinde of knowledge; not in an obſcure image, but in a neere and manifeſt repreſentation. Cuſan. Comp. Theolog. c. 12.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kindes of vnlawfull Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Arts, if wee may ſo call them, which are couered with the name of Magicke: and eſteemed abuſiuely to be as branches of that Tree, on whoſe root they neuer grew. The firſt of theſe hath the name of Necromancie or Goetia: and of this againe there are diuers kinds. The one is an Inuocation at the Graues of the dead, to whom the Diuell himſelfe giues anſwere in ſtead of thoſe that ſeeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortall ſoules of men doe not inhabit the duſt and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderſtanding to the liuing: death being nothing elſe but a ſeparation of the body and ſoule: and therefore the ſoule is not to be found in the Graues.

A ſecond practice of thoſe men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of coniuring or of raiſing vp Diuels, of whom they hope to learne what they liſt. Theſe men are ſo diſtract, as they beleeue that by terrible words they make the Diuell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Mouſe) they therein (as they ſuppoſe) inſconce themſelues againſt that great Monſter. Doubtleſſe, they forget that the Diuell is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodneſſe, no, not by the fearefull Word of the Almightie: and that he feared not to offer to ſit in Gods ſeat, that he made no ſcruple to tempt our Sauiour Chriſt, whom himſelfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting theſe proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet reſolue himſelfe, that he can draw the Diuell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phraſe: whereas in very truth, the obedience which Diuels ſeeme to vſe, is but thereby to poſſeſſe themſelues of the bodies and ſoules of thoſe which raiſe them vp; as His Maieſtie in his Booke aforenamed hath excellently taught: That the Diuels obedience is onely, ſecundum quid, ſcilicet ex pacto; reſpectiuè, that is, vpon bargaine.

I cannot tell what they can doe vpon thoſe ſimple and ignorant Diuels, which inhabite Iamblicus imagination; but ſure I am the reſt are apt enough to come vncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their ſeruants and vaſſals, doe no way neede any ſuch inforcement. Sunt in mundo genus quoddam poteſtatum valde diuiſum, indiſcretum & inconſideratum; & quod neque verum à falſo neque poſſibile diſcernit ab impoſſibile. L. Viues in cap. 11. lib. 10. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, lib. 10. Cuſa exerc. l. 2.

Or it may be that theſe Coniurers deale altogether with Cardans mortall Diuels, following the opinion of Rabbi Auornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that theſe kinde of Diuels liued not aboue a thouſand yeeres: which Plutarch in his Treatiſe de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true that the Diuels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwayes feare thoſe words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly maſtered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when hee had lifted him vp in the Ayre, caſt him headlong out of his clawes, when he was ſure he ſhould periſh with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the ſame prancke at other times vpon his owne accord the Diuell played with Theodotus: who tranſported (as Simon Magus was ſuppoſed to haue beene) had the ſame mortall fall that he had. The like ſucceſſe had Budas, a principall pillar of the Manichean Hereſie, as Socrates in his Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorie witneſſeth: and for a manifeſt proofe hereof we ſee it euery Euſe hiſt. Eccl. lib. 5. c. 16. Lib. 1. c. 22.

euery day, that the Diuell leaues all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallowes, for whom at other times he maketh himselfe a Pegasus, to conueigh them in haste to places farre distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that receiued not the truth (saith Saint Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Maiestie in the second Booke and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by vnanswerable reasons, that they are meerely illusiue.

2 Thess. 2.

Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Cristals: of whom Cusanus: Fatui sunt incantatores, qui in vngue & vitro volunt spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore: They are foolish Inchanters which will shut vp their spirits within their nailes or in Glasse: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

Exercitat. l. 2.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magicke; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and communicate withall. But the administring Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due vnto their Creator: so seeing they are most free Spirits; there is no man so absurd to thinke (except the Diuell haue corrupted his vnderstanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professours thereof couer themselues how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in generall; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or inforcement, are men of euill faith and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Diuels which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Diuinations: as by fire called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Mataeotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no lesse enuious and cruell, reuengefull and bloudy, then the Diuell himselfe. And these accursed creatures hauing sold their soules to the Diuell, worke two wayes, either by the Diuell immediately, or by the art of poysoning. The difference betweene Necromancers and witches, His Maiestie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Diuell.

There is another kind of pettie Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired then Mahomets Doue, which he had vsed to feed with Wheate out of his eare: which Doue, when it was hungrie, lighted on Mahomets shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breake-fast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gaue him aduice. And certainly if Banks had liued in elder times, hee would haue shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoeuer was most famous among them, could neuer master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

Aelian. l. 6. hist. diuer.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marsians a people of Italie practised: Colubros disrumpit Marsi cantu: Inchanting Marsia makes the snakes to burst.) That it hath beene vsed it appeares, Psalme 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde; and euen by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I finde no other Magicke or Inchantment, then to draw out a Mouse with a piece of tosted Cheese.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Diuell seemeth to worke his wonders.

BVt to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not giue to the Diuell any other dominion then hee hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance, as when Egypt, according to Dauid, was destroyed by euill Angels) he otherwise worketh but three wayes. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotency: the second, their owne reason disswading them from daring ouermuch, or indeede (and that which is the onely certaine cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Teneus eos ligatos (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas belluas. Saint Augustine was of opinion that the Frogges which Pharaos Sorcerers produced were not naturall, but that the Diuell (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Vairus obserueth, those Frogges of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeede. Hereof saith Saint Augustine: Nec sanè Dæmones naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo creatæ sunt commutant, vt videantur esse quod non sunt: The Diuels create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giueth the reason. Dæmon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Diuell filleth with certaine clouds all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason. Sinl. paris. de vniuers. p. 2. c. 70.

And as Tertullian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiueth, if the Diuell can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazell those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Diuell entreth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions. Maxima cùm est phantasia ad errores.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogges were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceiued by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like vnto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his Companions into Birds, per actiua cum passiuis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that Saint Augustine beleeued that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of naturall Magicke he vseth these words: De lege c. 24. fol. 67. De huiusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumq; animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verùm adhibitis adiutorijs, quæ ipsa semina naturæ confortant & acuunt, ita vt opus generationis tantum accelerent, vt eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consueuit) sed potentia Dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in hijs docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in hijs glorificant: In such workes (saith he) the sodaine generation of Frogges, and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by meanes strengthning the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of Nature, which vsually worketh more leisurely, but they thinke it is done by the powers of Diuels. But they who are learned in these Arts maruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two wayes the Diuels doe most frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the vttermost of nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or vnsearchable power, but of God onely.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the ayre, as well as moue it or compresse it; who knowes not that these things are also naturall? Or may it be obiected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that hee sometimes doth it; but how? In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his owne possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath liued from the infancie of the world to this day, and obserued the Ephe 2. 2 & 6. 12. succesſe of euery counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsaile with all those that studie and practise subuersion and destruction: hee that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence better iudge, then those that inhabite the earth: if hee should not sometimes, yea if hee should not very oftentimes guesse rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to giue impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned men doe Diabolus magnum habet rerum vsum; quæ res multum habet momenti in quouis negotio, Aug. de Anima c. 26. 27 &c.

oftentimes by comparing like causes conceiue rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Diuell doubteth and would willingly keepe his credit, hee euermore answereth by Riddles, as Crœsus Halym penetrans magnam subuertit opum vim,

If Cræsus ouer Halys goe,
Great Kingdomes he shall ouerthrow.

Which answere may be taken either way: either for the ouerthrow of his owne Kingdome, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Diuell may proceed in predictions, which (otherwise) belong to God onely; as it is in Esay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew vs at all times and certainly what is to come.

Gui. Parisiensis de legib. c. 24. Solius enim diuinæ intelligentiæ ac sapientiæ est, occulta nosse & reuelare; It is onely proper to Gods vnderstanding and wisedome, to know and reueale hidden things.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead by the power of the Diuell: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be obiected that the Diuell hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power haue done the like, as in the example giuen of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Diuels acts exceeded all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Iustine Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeede; and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis; from which authorities those men borrow strength which so beleeue. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions vpon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to thinke that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt animæ piorum à corpore separatæ, impiorũ autem pœnas luunt, donec istarum ad vitam æternam, illarum verò ad æternam mortem quæ secunda dicitur corpora reuiuiscant; The soules of the godly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the iust rise to eternall life, and of the wicked to an eternall and second death.

Iust. Martyr in colloq. cum Tryphone in resp. ad Ortho. quæst. 52. Ambr. in Luc. l. 2. c. 1. Lyra in Reg. 1. Aug. ad Simpl. l. 2. q. 3. De Ciuit. Dei, l. 13. c. 8.

And (besides S. Augustine) Iustine Martyr, Hilarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostome, and others, beleeued firmely, and taught it: that the soules of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyril) quum à corporibus sanctorum animæ abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitati diuinæ commendari; We must beleeue when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the diuine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most deare Father. If then they be in Heauen, the power of the Diuell cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Vnum (saith Augustine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternall fire; the other in Gods eternall Kingdome. And though it be written in Iure Pontificio, that many there are who beleeue that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Glosse vpon the same Text findes it ridiculous: Credunt, & malè, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Glosse) They beleeue, and they beleeue amisse, because they be but Phantasmes, or Apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath beene heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one: Hæc oratio à fraude atq; deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Diuell, saith Chrysostome. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Absit vt animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetæ, à dæmonio credamus extractam; God forbid that we should think that the soule of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet should be drawne vp againe by a Diuell.

Aug. de Ver. Apost. 18. Iust. Mart. ad Orthodox. q. 75. Hilar. Psal. 2. in fine. Tert. de anima. in fin. Athanas. q. 13. Chrys. hom. 19 in Euang. Mat. 26. q. 5. Episcopi.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel; so doe they the wooden images Cherubins: and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a booke not numbred among the Canonicall Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in his Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Siracides following the literall sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Diuell would willingly perswade ſwade, that the ſoules (yea euen of iuſt men) were in his power, yet ſo farre is it from the promiſes of the Scriptures, and from Gods iuſt and mercifull nature, and ſo contrarie to all diuine reaſon, as Saint Auguſtine (or whoſoeuer wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a deteſtable opinion ſo to thinke. For if God had ſo abſolutely forſaken Saul, that he refuſed to anſwere him either by dreames, by Vrim, or by his Prophets: it were ſottiſh to conceiue, that he would permit the Diuell, or a wicked Witch, to raiſe a Prophet from the dead in Sauls reſpect: it being alſo contrary to his owne diuine Law to aske counſaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elſewhere. Therefore it was the Diuell, and not the ſoule of a dead body, that gaue anſwere and aduice.

1 Kin. 17. 22. 2 Kings 4. 34. Nullus enim magus aut dæmon mortuum verè vnquam excitauit. Wier. de ſaſcin.

But becauſe Helias and Helizeus had raiſed ſome from the dead by the power of God; thoſe Diuels which S. Auguſtine calleth ludificatores animantium ſibi ſubiectorum, Mockers of their owne vaſſals, caſting before their eyes a ſemblance of humane bodies, and framing ſounds to their eares like the voyces of men, doe alſo perſwade their graceleſſe and accurſed attendants: that themſelues both poſſeſſe, and haue power ouer the ſoules of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tum ſpectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, ſaith L. Viues; The Diuell beguileth the ſenſe both of the beholders, and of thoſe that ſo imagine. Theſe then are the bounds of the Diuels power, whom if we will not feare, we muſt feare to ſinne. For when he is not the inſtrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himſelfe his voluntarie vaſſall: Poteſt ad malum inuitare, non poteſt trahere, ſaith S Auguſtine, he can allure, but he cannot inforce to euill. Such as thinke otherwiſe, may goe into the number remembred by Lucretius:

Nam veluti pueri trepidant, atq; omnia cæcis
In tenebris metuunt: ſic nos in luce timemus.

We feare by light, as children in the darke.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis: and of other of her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Niniue by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BVt to come backe to Ninus the amplifier and finiſher of Niniue: whether he performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaſter, it is vncertaine. As for the Citie it ſelfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and anſwerable magnificence. For it had in compaſſe 440. ſtadia, or furlongs; the wals whereof were an hundred foot vpright, and had ſuch a bredth as three Charriots might paſſe on the Rampire in front: theſe wals were garniſhed with 1500. Towres which gaue exceeding beautie to the reſt, and ſtrength no leſſe admirable for the nature of thoſe times.

Iuſtin. l. 1. Diod. l. 2. Sabel. Enn. 1.

But this Citie (built in the Plaines of Aſſyria, and on the bankes of Tigris, and in the Region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time, and (as ancient Hiſtorians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campſor, at ſuch time as Ninus amplified the ſame, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For theſe workes of Babylon and Niniue begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Aſſyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finiſhed Niniue, Semiramis Babylon: wherein ſhe fought to exceede her husband by farre. Indeed in the firſt Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to inuade others, nor feared to be inuaded: labouring to build Townes and Villages for the vſe of themſelues and their people, without either Wals or Towres; and how they might diſcharge the earth of Woods, Bryars, Buſhments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing in in that Age, when Ambition was in ſtrong youth: and putpoſing to follow the conqueſt which her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beautie and ſtrength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

THis ſhe did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had maſtered Bactria, and ſubiected vnto his Empire all thoſe Regions betweene it and the Mediterran Sea and Helleſpont (Aſia the leſſe excepted) and finiſhed the worke of Niniue, he left the World in the yeere thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeeres. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis deſired her husband Ninus, that he would grant vnto her the abſolute ſoueraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenæus, and others, ſpeakes of fiue dayes. In which time (moued either with deſire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who periſhed for her) ſhe cauſed Ninus her husband to be ſlaine. But this ſeemeth rather a ſcandall caſt on her by the Greeks, then that it had any truth.

Howſoeuer Ninus came to his end, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the ſole rule of the Aſſyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was ſaid to be the firſt Monarch, becauſe hee changed his ſeat from Babylonia in Chaldæa to Niniue in Aſſyria. Iuſtin reports, that Semiramis (the better to inveſt her ſelfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her ſo great a charge) preſented her ſelfe to the people in the perſon of her ſonne Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any ſenſible difference.

AElian. l. 7. ex Dino.

This report I take alſo to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as ſhe ruled long, ſo ſhe performed all thoſe memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and ſubſcribed that letter which ſhe ſent to the King of India (her laſt challenge and vndertaken conqueſt) by her owne name. And were it true that her ſonne Ninias had ſuch a ſtature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very perſonable) could be taken for him; yet it is very vnlikely that ſhe could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeeres after by any ſuch ſubtiltie: (for ſo long ſhee reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleaſures, as it is written of him) was well pleaſed with his Mothers proſperous gouernment and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphoſis of her Mother.

SOme Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue been of baſe parentage, calling her after the name of her Countrie, a Syrian. Beroſus cals her after the name of her Citie wherein ſhe was borne, Semiramis Aſcaloni-tis; of Aſcalon, the ancient Citie and Metropolis of the Philiſtims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Aſcalon, exceeding beautifull. Others ſay that this Derceta or Dercetis, the Mother of Semiramis, was ſometimes a Recluſe, and had profeſt a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated, ſeated on the banke of a Lake adioyning to Aſcalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man, ſhe was by him made with childe, which (for feare of extreame puniſhment) ſhe conuayed away, and cauſed the ſame to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the bankes of the Lake: in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beaſts) the ſame was fed by certaine birds, which vſed to feede vpon or neere thoſe waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that foſtered Romulus. For ſome one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and foſteridge of this childe, who being perchance but ſome baſe and obſcure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to couer her diſhonor and breach of vow, notwithſtanding which ſhe was caſt from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, and (as the Poets haue fained) changed by Venus into a Fiſh, all but her face, which ſtill held the ſame beautie & humane ſhape. It is thought that from this Dereeta the inuention of that Idoll of the Philiſtims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fiſhes body:

into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained onely the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath conuerted that place. Katablus, Pagninus, and Iunius, write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a fish, and so it onely appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idoll representing Triton, one of those imaginarie Sea-gods vnder Neptune. For this Citie being maritimate (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phœnicia) vsed all their deuotions to Neptune, and the rest of the pettie gods which attended him.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

BVt for her Pedigree, I leaue it to the Assyrian Heralds: and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Grecians. For delicacie and ease doe more often accompany licentiousnesse in men and women, then labour and hazzard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princesse more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the warres shee made with glorious successe: all but her last enterprise of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she neuer returned: and that of all her most powerfull Armie there suruiued but onely twentie persons: the rest being either drowned in the Riuer of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more then reason hath numbred: so were those that returned lesse then could haue escaped of such an Armie, as consisted of foure millions and vpwards. For these numbers which she leuied by her Lieutenant Dercetæus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Charriots armed with hookes on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand, of raw Hides for all vses three hundred thousand; of Galleyes with brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had euery man and beast but fed vpon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many friuolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Armie (though the same was farre inferiour to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the beliefe of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Armie of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellespont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the seuerall Prouinces whence those Galleyes were taken hath collected the number.

Suid. f. 245. lin. 5.

But of what multitude soeuer the Armie of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowne by Staurobates vpon the bankes of Indus, canticum cantauit extremum: she sang her last song; and (as Antiquitie hath fained) was changed by the gods into a Doue (the bird of Venus,) whence it came that the Babylonians gaue a Doue in their ensignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Ægypt.

AMong all her other memorable and more then magnificent workes (besides the wall of the Citie of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this Citie, inuironed with a wall carryed foure square of great heighth and beautie, hauing on each square certaine Brazen Gates curiously engrauen. In the Core of the square shee raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a lesse circuit) shee set a second Towre; and so eight in all, one aboue another: vpon the top whereof the Chaldæans Priests Priests made the obseruation of the starres, because this Towre ouer-topped the ordinary cloudes.

By beholding the ruines of this Towre haue many Trauailers beene deceiued, who suppose that they haue seene a part of Nimrods Towre, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense euery yeere (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Salomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redelliuered. This Temple Xerxes euened with the soile; which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the perswasions of the Chaldæans. I denie not that it might haue beene in his desire so to doe; but he enioyed but a few yeere after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Ægyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and leuell ground, and giuen to the same superstition of the Starres that the Chaldæans were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conspicua vndiq; nauigantibus, saith Plinie. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull obseruer of rarities (who being in Ægypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report:

Bellon. l. 2.

Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa sommite, & tirant vne fleche in l'air, a peine pourroit l'ennoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez; The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an Arrow from thence into the ayre as farre as he can, with great difficultie shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall vpon some of the degrees or steps.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE VVORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of Salomon.

THE SECOND BOOKE

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the Storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis; with a briefe transition to the question about the time of the birth of Abraham.

AFter the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Beroſus Annianus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the ouerthrow of Zoroaſter; contrary to Diodorus, Iuſtine, Oroſius, and all other approued writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all, but altogether feminine, and subiected to ease and delicacie, there is no probabilitie in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other then that out of ielousie hee euery yeere changed his Prouinciall Gouernors, and built Colledges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: not by Arius his successor, whom Suidas called Thurias; but that hee reduced againe the Bactrians and Assians, reuolted as it seemeth in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, inuented iewels of gold and stone, and some engins for the warre: I will for this present passe them ouer, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable (till we meet these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom and by whose issues we shall best giue date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham liuing at once with Ninius, Ninas, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes or Balamus. For otherwise we seeke to proue things certaine by the vncertaine, and the ages of those times, which the Scriptures leeus downe without error, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch vp the story at aduenture, and leaue it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe vs, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis historiam non constare, cum mutatis plerumque moribus ipsa ratio vetustatis obscuret. Plut. in Theseo ancient History must be darke.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes, hee must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeere the Flood happened after this flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three yeere of Ninus was the birth-yeere of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeere after the floud the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling betweene those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeeres; others 352. yeeres betweene Abrahams birth and the floud: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annius) makes but 250. yeeres from the floud to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeere of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeere of Abrahams birth was in the yeere after the floud 293, or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeere 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolued question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoueth me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, & without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enuie casteth at nouelty, than to goe on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors: or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuersity.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Floud, and not in the yeere 352.

THose which seeke to proue this account of 292. yeeres, betweene the generall floud and Abrahams birth, ground themselues, first on these words of the Scripture: So Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are slightly looked ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembred, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lye; that Terah at. 70. yeeres begot Abraham, Nahor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the sonne of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seuentieth yeere of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly obiected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeere of Terah his age, then in the 131. 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeere, in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. yeeres: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeeres.

§. III.

The answere to one of the obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one iourney out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

TO answere all which obiections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abrahams iourney into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his trauailes, that serueth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; the latter after his Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling, which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written. By faith Abraham (when hee was called) obeyed God, to goe out into a place which he should afterward receiue for inheritance: and hee went out, not knowing whether he went. Heb. 11. 8. This supposition (if it be granted) serues very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of S. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, Act. 7. 4. that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct, & plaine, what force hath any mans fancie or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iourneys into Canaan; one before Terah's death, & another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alleadged can picke any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that hee be beleeued in the rest. But that he performed the commandement of God after his Fathers death, leauing Vr and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselues are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams comming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes his aduersaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise; in which if any thing would haue brought him to despaire, he had more cause then euer man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborne nations: a Nation of valiant and resolued Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arriual, and driuen to flie into Ægypt for reliefe. His wife was olde, and hee had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himselfe for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the wayes themselues, which Abraham had ro passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuer of Euphrates, to trauell through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether these were easie walkes for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if he trauelled it twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Vr to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disproue this fancie; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proofe, that hee had not animum reuertendi, not any thought of looking backeward, than any mans bare coniecture, be hee of what antiquity or authority soeuer. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham tooke Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possest, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, & to the land of Canaan they came. Gen. 12. 5. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him, his wife, and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could haue beene thereto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnsetled, and prest with extreame famine at his first arriuall. For had his Father beene then aliue, he might haue hoped from him to receiue more assured comfort and reliefe, then among the Ægyptians, to whom he was a meere stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the

the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were vrged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plaine, if it be not ouer-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeeres olde, or a little more. How then did it happen, that hee left quite vndone the businesse, which as we reade, was within foure or fiue yeeres after that Gen.24. time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his onely care? Did not hee binde with a verie solemne oath his principall seruant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to trauaile into those parts, and seeke out a Wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither hee nor his seruant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly designe any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had beene there in person so latelie, as within foure or fiue yeeres before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of such importance; but would haue trusted his own iudgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desireable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely sonne, who was then fiue and thirtie yeeres old; before which age most of the Patriarches after the floud had begotten children: rather than haue left all at randome to the consideration of a seruant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be beleeued) that either Abraham forgot his businesse when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which Gen.24.35. 36. &c. no man can deuise. What might be the reason, that Abrahams man, in doing his Masters errand, was faine to lay open the whole story of his masters prosperitie, telling it as newes, that Sarah had borne to him a sonne in her old age? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine Author, had so lately beene among them, would not all this haue beene an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long vpon a thing so euident. Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to haue returned backe to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardlie answerable: considering how auerse hee was from permitting his sonne to be carried thi-
Gen.24.6. & 8. ther, euen though a wife of his owne kinred could not haue beene obtained without his personall presence. Iacob indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a Wife of his
Gen.28. owne linage; not without Gods especiall approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that iourney: yet he liued there as a seruant; suffered many iniuries; and finally was driuen to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may bee obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That briefe saying, Remember Lots Wife, containes much matter. Let vs but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Ægypt, out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was deliuered: we shall finde, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posteritie of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visi-
2 Kin.20. ted with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemes that he conceiued great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophecie which thereupon hee heard by Esai, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainely appeared in a following generation, when Psal 137. by the waters of Babylon they sate downe and wept. Concerning Ægypt we reade, that 1 Kin 14.25. & 2. Kin. 23. v.29. Sesac and Neco Kings of Ægypt brought calamitie vpon Israel: also that their confidence in the Ægyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Ægypt I doe not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deut.17.v.16 Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more returne that way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Ægypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laied any such iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things doe argue it probably: that he neuer returned, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of iudgement or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to proue it, I will beleeue as they doe. For all the trauailes of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Vr or Camerina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem

he remoued to a mountaine betweene Bethel and Hai: thence into Ægypt; from Ægypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flockes and heards of Cattle were more, then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time hee remooued to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, vnder Abimelec: and after heere vnto it at Bersabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Moriah. But this fiction of his retrait to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in anie one storie, either diuine or humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former iourney into Canaan, as Lenita his Cabala hath fained, it should in reason bee therewithall beleeued, that hee would in those his first trauailes haue prouided himselfe of some certaine seate, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, familie, goods and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham when he came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabite, hee departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discouer and finde out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleuenth, Hee went forth, going and iourneying towards the South: and alwaies vnsetled. By occasion of which wandring to and fro, some say, the Ægyptians gaue him and his the name of Hebræi. Gen. 12. v. 6.

Further, to prooue that hee had not formerly beene in the Countrie, wee may note, that ere hee came vnto Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him, saying, Vnto thy seede will I giue this Land, shewing it him as vnto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him vnknowne. For Abraham without anie other prouident care for himselfe, beleeued in the Word of the liuing God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discouer it; but being arriued, hee receiued a second promise from God, that he would giue those Countries vnto him and his seede to inhabite and inherite. Mont. in Caleb.

Lastly, what should moue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted anie such double iourney of Abrahams, seeing hee setteth downe all his passages elsewhere, long and short? as when hee moued from Sichem, and seated betweene Hai and Bethel: the distance being but 20. miles: and when hee moued thence to the valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles: and when he left Mamre, and sate downe at Gerar, being lesse then sixe miles; No, Moses past ouer all the times of the first age with the greater breuitie, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting vp all betweene the Creation & the Floud in sixe chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the fiue and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. yeres. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams trauels, or other actions: or that he would set downe those small remooues of fiue miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a iourney in going and comming would haue ministred some varietie of matter, or accident, worthie the inserting and adding to Abrahams storie.

§. IIII.

The answere to another of the obiections proposed, shewing that it was not vnlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirty yeere.

NOw touching the obiection, where it is said, that it was very vnlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to haue a sonne at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham hauing respect onely to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeeres. For when the Angell said vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre; Loe, Sarah thy wife shall haue a sonne, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were olde and stricken in age, and it ceased to bee with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said, it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah had many sonnes after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Iocshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeeres after Isaac: and the yongest yongest 40. yeeres after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeeres olde should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despaire of Abraham at one hundred yeeres? For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac was born in the yeere 2109: and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. sons 36. yeres after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Iesse, who liued so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begat sonnes at 100. yeeres, or neere it, it cannot be maruailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and seuen yeeres after.

Origen. hom. 11 in Gen. Aug. de Ciu. dei. l. 16. c. 34. Caietā: & Perer. in Gen.

§. V.

The answere to two more of the obiections: shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speake something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. yeeres old. For Abrahams age being made vncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnlesse we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeere of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answere, that Saint Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terah: which knowne, there can bee no errour in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham onely, with whom God established the Couenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answere, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nahor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Israel: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Iacob: Milcah also the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Iacobs great grand-mother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a son at 90. yeres, and when by nature she could not haue conceiued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselues, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-childe of Nahor; and Iacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-childe also of Nahor: It was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Ios. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleeued and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countrey, and Citie of Vr in Chaldæa, as Abraham did, and remoued thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldæa; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also, who remained at Charran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Iacob, his owne kinse-men: he himselfe hauing also married in his owne familie; not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselues with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleeued in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he inuited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Iehouah, &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answere as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said; This thing is proceeded of Iehouah: meaning that it was the wil of the true God it should be so; wherin he acknowledged Gods prouidence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, goe that she may be thy Masters sons wife, euen as Iehouah hath said. This their often vsing of the name of Iehouah, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a ſigne that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chryſoſtome, and ſome latter writers, as Caietan, Oleaſter, Muſculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, becauſe he retained certaine Idols, or houſehold Gods, which Rachel ſtole from him; yet that he beleeued in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams ſeruant, bleſſed of IEHOVAH, as aforeſaid. So as for my ſelfe I dare not auow, that theſe men were out of the Church, who, ſure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham firſt of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that he was the eldeſt: together with diuers reaſons prouing that Abraham was not the eldeſt ſonne of Terah.

TO the maine obiection which I anſwer laſt, becauſe it ſeemeth of moſt ſtrength, by which, thoſe that ſtriue to ſhorten the times, endeuour to proue that Abraham was the eldeſt ſonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themſelues firſt and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And Terah liued Gen. 11. v. 26. 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: To this I ſay, that although Abraham in this verſe be firſt named, yet the ſame is no proofe at all that he was the eldeſt and firſt borne ſonne of Terah. For it is no neceſſary conſequence, that the firſt named in Scriptures was therefore eldeſt in bloud and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleaſed God to make eſpeciall choice of the firſt ſonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the firſt borne of Adam; nor Iſaac of Abraham; nor Iacob of Iſaac; nor Iuda and Ioſeph of Iacob: nor Dauid the eldeſt of Ieſſe; nor Salomon of Dauid: as is formerly remembred.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: ſhewing that at the 500. yeere of his age hee began to beget the firſt of thoſe three ſonnes. For according to S. Auguſtine, ſpeaking generally, Nec attendendus eſt in his ordo natiuitatis, ſed ſignificatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham. The order of nati- Aug. quæſt. ſuper Gen. 25. uitie is not heere to be reſpected, but the ſignification of the future dignitie: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the ſonnes of Noah: ſo is it here; where it is ſaid, that Terah liued 70 yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himſelfe beeing begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Anceſtors were at 30. The like alſo happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enoſh Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalaleel at 70; Mahalaleel Iered at 60: Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the firſt of his three ſonnes, as aforeſaid. And S. Auguſtine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the yongeſt of Terah's ſonnes, then otherwiſe: though for his excellencie he was worthily named firſt. His owne words are theſe: Fieri enim potuit vt poſterior ſit generatus Abraham: ſed merito excellentiæ, qua in Scripturis valdè commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, ſaith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was firſt named in regard of his excellencie, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming firſt or laſt proueth nothing who was firſt or laſt borne: either in thoſe iſſues of Noah, or in theſe of Terah: Neither hath God any reſpect of the eldeſt in nature, as touching his election or ſpiritual bleſſing, for Moſes nameth firſt the children of the promiſe, and the eldeſt and firſt in Gods fauour. Pietas ergò vel ipſa potius electio diuina, quæ comitem ſecum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in libris Noæ, & Abrahamo in libris Thare. Pietie, ſaith he, or rather diuine election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it, pietie and the feare of God, gaue place and precedencie to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among thoſe of Thare.

For the reſt it is manifeſt, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Iſmael, when Abraham had liued 86. yeres. It was Gen. 12. 4. at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Iſaac, when Abraham had conſu- Gen. 16. 16. med an 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham roſe out, when he reſcued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeres: and it is as manifeſt that hee parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if Act. 7. 4.

Terah

Gen. 14. Terah begat Abraham at 70. yere old, then must Abraham haue beene 135. yeeres when he first set his foote in Canaan: seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For he entred at 75: he rescued Lot at 83: he had Ismael at 86: he had Isaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Moreouer, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of his age: then had Terah liued till Isaac had beene 35. yeeres olde, and Ismael, 49. both which must then haue beene borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: vnlesse we should either denie credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his fathers death: or else beleiue the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greek word, μετα, may be transported by the Latine sub, aswell as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeeres before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to haue beene borne in the seuenty yere of Terah; we must giue those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authoritie will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Vr of Chaldæa, nor in Haran: nor in tenne yeeres after his arriuall into Canaan. For the yeere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yeere of the World 2083. and the yeere of Ismaels birth was the Worlds yeere 2094: which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot bee that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah liued; nor in lesse then tenne yeeres after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs age.

Gen. 12. Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also haue been the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeeres: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeere of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Iscah wanted but tenne yeeres of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres olde.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had beene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at nine yeeres olde: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeere after Abraham, and Sarah within ten yeeres as olde as Abraham, then of necessitie must Haran beget her, when he had liued but nine yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iscah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principalitie. Againe, to what end was the word Iscah or Ishcah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For to speake of anything superfluous it is not vsed in Gods Bookes: and if Iscah had not belonged to the storie, it had beene but an idle name to no purpose remembred.

Now if it had beene true (as those of the contrarie opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nachor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscah in this place, were shee not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproueth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called an olde man when Abraham was but 83. yeeres: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; Abraham marrying one of Harans daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within ten yeeres as old as Abraham: it may appeare to euery reasonable man (not obstinate and preiudicate) that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his Father left Vr in Chaldæa. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams eldership, vpon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. yeeres yonger then Abraham himselfe. Lyra his words are these: Si igitur Haran fuit iunior ipso

Abraham,

Abraham, ſequitur quòd non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram : imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, & ideò melius videtur dicendum, quòd Abraham fuit vltimò natus de tribus filijs Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter eius dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput ſtirpis & generationis ſequentis : & quia primò facta eſt ei repromiſsio expreſſa de Chriſto, ſicut ſupra dictum eſt de Sem, &c. If therefore (ſaith Lyra) Haran was yonger then Abraham himſelfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeeres old when he begat Sarah : And therefore it ſeemeth better to be ſaid, that Abraham was the laſt borne of the three ſonnes of Thare, neuertheleſſe he is named firſt for his dignitie, both becauſe hee was to be ordained head of the ſtocke and generation following, and becauſe the promiſe of Chriſt was firſt made vnto him; as before it is ſaid of Sem.

§. VII.

A concluſion of this diſpute, noting the Authors on both ſides : with an admonition, that they which ſhorten the times, make all ancient ſtories the more vnprobable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reaſon, that Haran was the eldeſt ſonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yeere. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that iourney by Abraham performed when he was 75. yeres old; theſe two numbers added make 205. yeres, the full age of Terah : ſeeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my ſelfe, I haue no other end herein then to manifeſt the truth of the Worlds Story : I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers : but I know they were miſtaken in particulars. Saint Auguſtine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controuerſie. For whatſoeuer is borrowed from him out of his ſixteenth Booke de Ciuitate Dei, cap. 15. the ſame may be anſwered out of himſelfe in his fiue and twentieth queſtion vpon Gen. But Saint Auguſtine herein followed Ioſephus and Iſidor : and Beda followed S. Auguſtine. And it was out of a fooliſh pride and vanitie, that the Hebrewes and Ioſephus ſought to make Abraham the firſt borne : as if God had had reſpect to the eldeſt in nature. So did Ioſephus together with Nicholas Damaſcenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Iewiſh Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah : and ſaid that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which euery one had an infinite multitude vnder him; trecentos & octodecem præfectos habuit : quorum ſingulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharao inuading him with a great Armie, tooke from him his Wife Sarah : Such fables argue that Ioſephus is not to bee beleeued, but with diſcreete reſeruations. Act. 7. 4. Gen. 12. 4.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeeres from the Floud to Abraham, is vpheld by many of the Hebrews. But how ſhould wee value the opinion of ſuch Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod ? Surely, if their iudgement in ſuch matters were worthy to be regarded, it would haue appeared in ſetting downe the ſucceſſion of the Perſian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whoſe Hiſtorie was not ſo farre remote in time, as theſe antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet groſſely haue they erred therein, and ſo familiar are their miſtakings in all things of like nature, that we ſeldome finde their opinion rehearſed without the confutation treading on the heeles of it. They of the Romane religion are alſo generally on the ſame ſide : it being a thing vſuall among them, to maintaine whatſoeuer they haue beene formerly knowne to hold and beleeue. Contrariwiſe, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and ſome following him; of later times Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Caluin, Iunius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moore, with diuers of the Proteſtants, hold Abraham to haue beene borne in the 130. yeere of his Father Terah. From theſe (as in a caſe not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the ſame Religion, and thoſe neuertheleſſe good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chitraus, Functius and others, are very auerſe heerein, eſpecially Ioſephus Scaliger with his Sethus Caluiſius, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poyſonous. Contrariwiſe, Auguſtinus Torniellus a Prieſt of the Congregation of Saint Paul, a iudicious, diligent, and free writer, whoſe Annales are newly ſet forth, very earneſtly defends the opinion, which I haue already deliuered; not alleadging Beroaldus, nor any Proteſtant writer, as beeing perhaps vnwilling to owe thankes to heretikes. For my ſelfe I doe neither miſlike the contrary opinion, becauſe commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to vphold it, Nor fauour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers haue approoued it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of iudgement, that the best approued Historians, Diuine and prophane, labour to inuestigate the truth of times, thereby to approue the stories, and forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudgement to our selues, which of those two accounts giue the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, & those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeres, or thereabouts, betweene the floud and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeres betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to bee the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeere of his life: the other a yonger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeres. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not hastily satisfie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated doe slothfully and drowsily sit downe; we shall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it aboue 1072. yeeres betweene the Floud and Abrahams birth: then to take away any part of those 352. yeres giuen. For if wee aduisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abrahams time, yea before Abraham was borne, wee shall finde that it were very ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times ouer-deepely betweene Abraham and the Floud: because in cutting them too neere the quick, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleede thereby, were not the testimonie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That whersoeuer any one place in the Scriptures may bee conceiued disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-vnderstood. For in Abrahams time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Ægypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the World besides, as farre as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and maruailes? giuing also strength thereby to common cauillers, and to those mens apish braines, who only bend their wits to finde impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and Mankinde.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

An mūdi 2008 dil. 352. natus Abraham, Eus. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei l. 16. c. 17.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alleadged, I conclude, that from the generall Floud, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeeres were consumed: and taking the Assyrian History with vs, the same number of yeeres were spent from the Floud to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeere of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeres, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeeres to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, wee may the more safelie giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approueth. Giuing then 30. yeeres more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and fiue yeeres to the fiue elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeeres were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes were were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and compariſon: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the ſame yeere of his life. Gen. 11. 18.

Let vs then allow 60. yeeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or elſe we ſhall hardly finde people to build Babel: for ſure wee are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: becauſe it diſpleaſed God. Theſe two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The reſt of the time of 131. (in which yeere they arriued in Shinar, whereof there are 6. yeeres remaining) we may giue them for their trauels from the Eaſt: becauſe they were peſtered with women, children and Cattell: and as ſome ancient writers haue conceiued, and Becanus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaines ſides, for feare of a ſecond Floud. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remaines 221. of which number Beroſus beſtoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Auguſtine approueth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeeres of the 352. from the Floud to Abrahams birth: which number of 114. neceſſitie beſtoweth on Nimrod.

An. à ſalute humani generis ab aquis centeſimo primo cœpit regnum Babyloniacum ſub noſtro Saturno patre ſuum Belus, qui imperauit annis 65: Beroſus.

And if it be obiected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: ſure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the reſt of the ſame deſcent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-ſhort. For Nimrod, by this accompt, liued in all but one hundred ſeuenty nine yeres: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the ſonne of Arphaxad the ſonne of Sem, liued foure hundred three yeeres: and of the ſame age of the World was Nimrod the ſonne of Chus, the ſonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne,

Ninus reigned 9. yeres: which added to 43. make ——— 52.

Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his Succeſſor.

Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Aſſyria 42. yeeres, and died in the 52. yeere compleat of Abrahams life. Of the World 2017. Of the Floud 761.

Ninias or Zameis ſucceeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeeres, in the ſecond yeere of whoſe reigne Abraham left Meſopotamia. 2059. mundi. 403. à dil.

When Abraham was 85. yeeres olde, hee reſcued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by ſurpriſe Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeeres, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeeres after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeere of his age: ſo that Amraphel may ſeeme to haue beene this Ninias the ſonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whoſe 23. yeere as aforeſaid, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeere of Abraham, and the 33. yere of his owne reigne: after which he reigned fiue yeeres: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reaſons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not eaſily anſwered. Howbeit for the times of the Aſſyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we haue ſet them downe, according to the times noted by Moſes, in the ſtorie of Abraham, it is moſt certaine; vnleſſe we will either derogate from the truth of Moſes his computation, which were impietie: or account the whole Hiſtorie of Ninus and Semiramis to bee but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Hiſtorians for fablers. 2083. 427. 2093. 437.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew: Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene Ninias the ſonne of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moſes makes King of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the reigne of Ninias Zameis the king of the Aſſyrians, the ſonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babilonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the anſwere which firſt offereth it ſelfe as moſt probable, is that which hath beene alreadie noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other then our Amraphel: who inuaded Traconitis or Baſan, and ouerthrew thoſe fiue kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the ſucceſſour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abrahams life: wherein he reſcued Lot, ſlew Chederlaomer, and ouerthrew the reſt. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greateſt Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel be firſt named by Moſes in the firſt verſe of the 14. Chapter of Geneſis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the fiue Cities, were

Gen. 14. 4. the vaſſalls of Chedarlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, Twelue yeeres were they ſubiect to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterpriſe, who was then King of Elam, which is Perſia: Now Perſia being ſeated ouer Tigris, and to the Eaſt of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, beeing ſeated to the Weſt of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it ſelfe, ſeemeth at this time to haue had no great ſcope or large dominion. For had Amraphel beene ſo great a Prince as prophane Hiſtorians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he ſucceeded, he ſhould not haue needed the aſſiſtance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the firſt and greateſt of thoſe foure Kings, (as it is manifeſt that he was: For theſe little kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vaſſals, and not Amraphels,) yet this makes not the coniecture leſſe probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Aſſyria, had now (as we ſhall ſhew more plainely in that which followeth) receiued a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betweene India and the Phœnician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Of Arioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof hee is ſaid to haue beene King, lies betweene Cœleſyria and Arabia Petræa.

NOw the two other kings ioyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellaſſar, the other of the Nations. For Ellaſſar, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: ſo Toſtatus thinketh that it ſhould bee Helleſpont: which opinion Pererius fauoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine tranſlation. For as Pontus, ſo is Helleſpont farre diſtant, and out of the way to ſend any Armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumæa, which Countries theſe foure King chiefly inuaded: Beſides that, it is certaine, that the Aſſyrians (when they were greateſt) had neuer any dominion in Aſia the leſſe. For at ſuch time as the Aſſyrians feared the inuaſion of the Medes and Perſians, they ſent not into Aſia the leſſe as commanders: but vſed all the Art Xenophon. they had to inuite Cræſus to their aſſiſtance: perſwading him that nothing could bee more dangerous for himſelfe, and the other Kings of thoſe parts, than the ſucceſſe of the Medes againſt the Aſſyrians. But examine the enterpriſe what it was. Theſe Kings (ſaith Gen. 14. the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodome, Birſha King of Gomorha, Shinab King of Admath, and Shemebar King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which fiue Kings had not ſo much ground as Middleſex: being ſuch a kinde of Reguli, as Ioſua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and ſmall territories adioyning; of which Canaan had three and thirtie, all ſlaine or hanged by Ioſua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are ſaid alſo to haue inuaded, bee imagined to haue beene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Helleſpont, had manifeſted a great impotence and weakeneſſe in the Kings of Babylon and Perſia.

And though it be alleadged for an example, that diuers Kings farre off, came to aſſiſt Pompey againſt Cæſar: yet theſe ſame examples without like occaſions and circumſtances, do neither leade nor teach. For there was no cauſe to feare the greatneſſe of theſe pettie Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cæſar; and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no leſſe doubtfull then fearefull: But the whole Countrie by theſe foure Kings maſtered in their paſſage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betweene Iordan and the mountaines of Seir: incloſed by the riuer of Arnon on the South ſide, and by Lybanus on the North, conſiſting of the two ſmal Prouinces of Trachonitis or Baſan, and the Region of the Moabites: a conqueſt farre vnualuable, and little anſwering to the power of the Aſſyrian Empire, if the ſame had remained in any comparable eſtate with the times of Ninus & Semiramis, who ſubiected al the great kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellespont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellassar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to ioyne with the Assyrians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellassar at all, but as they keepe the word Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Arke did rest, so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellassar, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himselfe remembreth other opinions farre more probable then this of Pontus or Hellespont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Vrbibus a Grecian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas in the border of Cœlesyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cœlesyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly ioyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that wee finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was Generall of his armie, & the principall Commander vnder him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch Confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre remoued from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Iudith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria; according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betweene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (knowne by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the gouernment of that Persian Prouince called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Iudith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch heere spoken of may with more reason bee taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West vnto Babylonia, and Chaldaea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and bloud: which Diod: Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

THe fourth King by Abraham ouerthrown was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Goiym, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation: Pererius out of Strabo, findes that Galilea was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namelie of Aegyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galilæam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilea was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoeuer they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdoms adioyning to Phœnicia, and Palestina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these doe also ioyne themselues to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselues together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest coniecture.

Gen. 12. 6.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

LAstly, whereas it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Prouinciall gouernour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldæa, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings ware on their heads.

Neither doe I beleeue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this inuasion, and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-looke what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tamberlain conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioyned a short life: and whatsoeuer things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, inuaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, then her Paramor: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampled. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those Kings adioyning (whose subiection, and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grieuous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successour. For in regno Babylonico hic parum resplenduit, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it is that the neckes of mortall men hauing beene neuer before galled with the yoake of forraine dominion, nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slauerie: no long descent hauing as yet inuested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand: the fooliſh and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had vsed before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idlenesse, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeeres, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that hee so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indeuoured to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keepe what he could not without contentious perill enioy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained againe to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trauaile vpon Abraham, from Vr in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then setled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yere of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voyce of God, tooke this great iourney in hand: in which time of 23. yeeres after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recouered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis Armie of foure millions, with her selfe vtterly consumed in India, and al her armies and engins of warre, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest soules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, inuaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not beene reuolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recouered one part, so did Baleus or Balaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest reuolted to their former obedience. Of whome it is said that he conquered from Ægypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes id est, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vndertakings had beene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselues from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath beene gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselues: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

THe consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusall, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellowes, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intituled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may wee otherwise conceiue of this Historie: remouing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue beene vnwilling to finde, because they could not finde how to resolue them. For as it had beene a strange coniecture to thinke that Arioch was drawne to assist the Persian, against the Sodomite, as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue beene once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those fiue Townes, whose very names how they should come to his eare, being disioyned by so many great Nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Elhasar, and that of Tidal, so far off remoued, were become his dependants; what reason can wee finde that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodome and Gomorah? and when he should haue fought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to imploy the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against fiue pettie Townes, leaning Tyrus and Sidon, & the great Citie of Damascus, with many other places of much importance, and farre neerer vnto him, vnsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alleadged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the obiections to be made against his reconquest of these fiue Cities, when they had reuolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it beene in that small Prouince to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, then that he should come or send to reclaime them: was it not more then madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of exasion: yea to make resistance (being themselues a dissolute and therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betweene Euphrates, yea betweene themselues and the riuer of

Indus

Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should finde no great wisedome, if he knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might haue subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Countrie, was not sufficient to countervaile one moneths charges of so huge an armie. How small then must his valour haue beene, who with so mightie preparations effected no more then the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrie, although he had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this invasion (supposed so great) make any fearefull matter: but Gen 14.17. compose the two armies as equally match, saying they were foure kings against fiue: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall finde that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Ninias, who liued foure or fiue yeeres longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Histories haue forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appeares, that these foure kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders euery one of his owne company, which he carried forth as a Colonie, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Countrie which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoeuer will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations in the infancie of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens inuading Affrica and Spaine, with almost as many kings as seuerall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusuall, for the leaders of Colonies to receiue title from the people whom they conducted: not to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the sloathfull qualitie of Ninias then reigning in Assyria: whose vnmanlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vndertaking spirits, as wanted the imploiments whereunto they were accustomed, in the reigne of Semiramis, rather to seeke aduentures abroad, than to remaine at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthy than themselues, were aduanced. If the consent of the whole streame of writers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Vnder king or Satrapa of Shinar, vnder Ninias; who may be supposed to haue had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Ninive: and to haue preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom he hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, That these foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselues, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And here to adde, that Chedorlaomer seemes rather called a Persian king, then King of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdome vndoubtedly was betweene Syria and Arabia) hauing beene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance to these Captaines or petie Kings. These and such like things here to vrge, were but with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is vnworthy to haue cost bestowed vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to imploy any more time in making it good, but to leaue it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he finde any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countries or people soeuer these foure were Kings, this expedition is the only publique action that we we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his ſonnes, and of his Nephews Eſau and Iacob, as they are regiſtred by Moſes, becauſe it is not our purpoſe, either to ſtand vpon things generally knowne to all Chriſtians, nor to repeate what hath beene elſewhere already ſpoken, nor to preuent our ſelues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we paſſe them here in ſilence. And becauſe in this Storie of Abraham and his poſteritie, there is much mention of Ægypt: by which it appeares that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a ſetled and flouriſhing kingdome; it will not be amiſſe in the next place to ſpeake ſomewhat of the antiquities, and firſt kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the firſt peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the deliuerie of the Iſraelites from thence.

§. I.

A briefe of the names and times of the firſt Kings of Ægypt: with a note of the cauſes of difficulty in reſoluing of the trueth in theſe points.

SOone after the confuſion at Babel (as it ſeemes) Cham with many of his iſſue and followers (hauing doubtleſſe knowne the fertilitie of Ægypt before the Floud) came thither and tooke poſſeſſion of the Countrie; in which they built many Cities: and beganne the kingdome one hundred nintie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouernours of this Kingdome till ſuch time as Iſrael departed Ægypt, are ſhewne in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.
2269.	613.	Typhon / Hercules.
2276.	620.	Orus.
2391.	735.	Seſoſtris the great.
2424.	768.	Seſoſtris the blinde.
2438.	782.	Buſiris or Oris the ſecond.
2476.	820.	Acenchere or Thermutis or Meris.
2488.	832.	Ratheris or Athoris.
2497.	841.	Chencres drowned in the red Sea.

The Table and eſpecially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and coniectures, becauſe in ſuch obſcuritie, manifeſt and reſtleſſe truth cannot be found. For Saint Auguſtine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had ſought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are loſt, yet omitted the ſucceſſion of the Ægyptian Kings: which he would not haue done, if they had not beene more vncertaine then the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, then whom doubtleſſe they were more glorious. One great occaſion of this obſcurity in the Ægyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Prieſts: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leaſings, and recounted vnto ſtrangers, the names of many Kings that neuer reigned. What ground they had for theſe reports of ſuppoſed Kings, it ſhall appeare anon. Sure it is that the magnificent workes and and royall buildings in Ægypt, ſuch as are neuer found but in States that haue greatly flouriſhed, witneſſe that their Princes were of marueilous greatneſſe: and that the reports of the Prieſts were not altogether falſe. A ſecond cauſe of our ignorance in the Ægyptian Hiſtory, was the too much credulity of ſome good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrary reports of ſundry Ægyptians, and publiſhing in their owne name, ſuch as pleaſed them beſt; haue confirmed them, and as it were inforced them vpon vs, by their authority. A third and generall cauſe of more than Ægyptian darkeneſſe in all ancient Hiſtories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Annius, of whom (if to the cenſures of ſundry very learned, I may adde mine) I thinke thus; That Annius hauing ſeene ſome fragments of thoſe writers, and added vnto them what he would, may be credited, as an auoucher of true Hiſtories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwiſe is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it commeth to paſſe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Ægyptian Kings, runs three altogether different wayes. The Chriſtian writers, ſuch as are ancient, for the moſt part follow Euſebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Annius his Authors: The prophane Hiſtories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and ſuch others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynaſties, and otherwiſe, it appeares that Chams reigne in Ægypt began in the yeere after the Floud, 191.

TO reconcile theſe, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is moſt controuerſie, the beſt meane is by helpe of the Dynaſties: of whoſe continuance there is little or no diſagreement. The account of the Dynaſties (beſides the authoritie of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the moſt part, if not altogether with the Hiſtories of the Aſſyrians, Troians, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall conſent, with the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue firſt Dynaſties laſted each of them ſeuen yeeres, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater gods: ſo that all the yeers of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynaſt endured foureteene yeers: the fourteenth 26. the fifteenth 37. Theſe three laſt, are ſaid to haue beene vnder the three yonger Gods. So the fifteene firſt Dynaſties laſted one hundred ſixty one yeeres. As I doe not therefore beleeue that the continuance of theſe Dyn. was ſuch as hath beene mentioned, becauſe Annius in ſuch wiſe limits out their time: ſo I cannot reiect the account vpon this onely reaſon, that Annius hath it ſo: conſidering that both hitherto it hath paſſed as currant, and is greatly ſtrengthened by many good reaſons. For, whereas Euſebius placeth the beginning of the ſixteenth Dynaſtie, in the yeere of Abrahams birth, as aforeſaid: the reckoning is eaſily caſt; by which the ſumme of 161. yeeres, which according to our account were ſpent in the fifteene former, being ſubducted out of the ſum of 352. yeeres, which were betweene the Floud and Abrahams birth, ſhew that the beginning of the firſt Dynaſtie, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Ægypt, was in the yeere 191. As alſo by other probabilities the ſame may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankinde which came into Shinar, arriued at Babel, Anno à diluuio 131. In building the Tower were conſumed fourtie yeeres, as Glicas recordeth: whoſe report I haue eleſewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in paſſing with his company, their Wiues, Children, Cattell, and ſubſtance, through all Syria then deſolate, and full of Bogges, Forreſts, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred ſeuentie one yeeres had brought vpon it) no reaſonable man will doubt. To this his paſſage therefore, and the ſeating of himſelfe in Ægypt, we allow twenty yeeres: and theſe ſummes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeeres after the Floud, before they arriued at Babel, 40. yeeres for their ſtay there, and 20. for Chams paſſage into Ægypt, and ſetling there, make vp the ſumme of 191. yeeres; at which time we ſaid that Cham began his reigne in Ægypt, in the beginning of the firſt Dynaſtie. And to this ſumme of 191. yeeres if wee adde the 161. yeeres of the 15. firſt Dynaſties, as they are numbred in common account, wee ſhall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And herero omitting many other reaſons, which might be brought to proue that theſe firſt Dynaſties muſt needes haue beene very ſhort, and not containing in the whole ſumme of their ſeuerall times aboue 161. yeeres: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Ægypt haue beene peopled as soone as Babel after the Floud: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinkes) must haue beene before the Floud. That the arriuall at Babel was many yeeres before the plantation of Ægypt, after the Floud, enough hath beene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the Floud, the number of the long-liu'd generations betweene Adam and the Floud, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witnesse. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue beene as well after the Floud, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrie erect such forme of Policie, as had beene vsed in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oft times many vnder one King.

THe short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not seuerall races of Kings, as the vaunting Ægyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest proofe, That it was the manner of the Ægyptian Kings, to put the gouernment of the Countrie into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, onely reseruing the Soueraignty to themselues, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Visier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue beene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsailors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Ægypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistim in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoste, though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his priuate carriage, he followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not he the sonne of Ierubbaal? and Zebul is his Officer? Also Ishbosheth the sonne of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Dauid himselfe hating Ioab for his crueltie, did not punish him in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite liuing then in Ægypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appeares by the Scriptures: therfore likely both for his owne idlenesse and pleasure, to haue laid the burden of gouernment vpon others; and vpon iealousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. Aboue all other proofes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph; Onely in the Kings throne will I be aboue thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Ægypt. William, Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirmes that the like or very same forme of gouernment by Viceroys, was in his time practised in Ægypt, hauing there beene inrse (as he beleeued) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainely shewes, that the Soldans of Ægypt were not Lords of the Countrie, how euer they haue beene so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill gouernment, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office & authority royall into the Soldans hands. He that shall reade in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Malene Elhadech, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Ioseph was, though farre inferiour in wisedome.

Willa. Tyr. de bell. Sacro. l. 19. c. 17. 18. 19. & 20.

Lib. 19. c. 30.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the List of the Ægyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Ioseph's brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrie: Besides, it is not vnlikely that the vaineglorious Ægyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royall managing of the State had paſſed, whileſt that the King himſelfe intending his quiet, had giuen his office to another. How ſtrangers haue miſtaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Ioſephs brethren, doth ſufficiently witneſſe. The reports of Prieſts doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, ſay; Diodorus, that Seſoſtris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas: which could not haue been, if Menas had beene Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynaſties were not ſo many races of Kings, but ſucceſſions of Regents, appointed by the kings of ſo many ſundry linages or ſorts of men. Now by whatſoeuer meanes a Dynaſtie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: ſure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royall alwaies paſſed by deſcent, and not by election: which (beſides conſent of Authors) the Scriptures alſo proue. For whereas Ioſeph bought all the land of Ægypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had paſſed by election, then ſhould Pharaoh's children hereby either haue beene inthralled amongſt the reſt of the people, to the next ſucceſſor: or inioying their Fathers land, though not his eſtate, haue beene more mighty then the King: as Land-lords of all Ægypt, and the King himſelfe their Tenant. Likewiſe we finde in Exod. 12. that God ſmote the firſt borne of Pharaoh, that was to ſit on his Throne. And in Eſay it is ſaid of Pharaoh: I am the ſonne of the ancient King.

of

Eſay 19.

Of Cham, and his ſonne Mizraim, or Oſiris.

THat the ſucceſſion of Kings began, and continued in ſuch wiſe as the Table hath ſhewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to ſhew. Ægypt is called in the Scripture, the land of Ham. That this name is not giuen to it, becauſe the poſterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himſelfe did firſt plant it, we may gather by many circumſtances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cuſh, Put, or Canaan, as well as Ægypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Oſiris calleth himſelfe the eldeſt ſonne of Cham, ſaying, Nihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: alſo, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoſo ortum: which muſt needes be vnderſtood of Cham: for this Saturnus Ægyptius was Cham: as it is ſaid, that on the monument of Ninus was an inſcription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Ægyptius. Likewiſe the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Ægypt, doth teſtifie, that Ham reſided in thoſe parts: And S. Hierome in quæſtionibus Hebraicis ſaith, that the Ægyptians themſelues did in his dayes call their Countrie Ham: as in foure ſeuerall places in the Pſalmes this Countrie is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Oſiride, that in the ſacrifices of the Ægyptians this Countrie of Ægypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: vt puto (ſaith he) à Chamo Noes filio, to which alſo he addeth out of Iſidore, Ægyptum vſq; hodie Ægyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: that Ægypt vnto this day in the tongue of the Ægyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the ſame reaſons may ſuffice to be alleadged, which I haue already giuen in proofe of the time ſpent in the 15. firſt Dynaſties: Neither is it ſtrange that the reigne of Cham ſhould laſt ſo long as 161. yeeres: conſidering that Sem liued 600: Arphachſhad and Shelah each aboue 400. But ſtrange it had beene, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in thoſe long-liued generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Baeh, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the ſame brood, obſcured the fame and glory of Oſiris, Orus, and Seſoſtris. Reineccius in hiſtor. Iulia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwiſe called Oſiris according to Diodorus: who ſaith he was the ſonne of Hammon: Krentzhemius ſaith that Mizraim and Oſiris are words of neere affinitie and ſound in the Hebrew tongue. Howſoeuer it be, we know that Mizraim the ſonne of Cham, was Lord of Ægypt, and Reineccius citing good authoritie in this caſe, affirmeth that Ægypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language, Mezre. Neither doe I ſee cauſe of doubt whether Oſiris were the ſame with Mizraim. It is more neceſſary, and hard to ſhew manifeſtly, how long Mizraim or Oſiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where preciſely ſet downe, we muſt be faine to follow probabilities. That hee is not vainly ſaid by Annius his Beroſus, to haue begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynaſtie of the Thebai began, it appeareth, firſt, by the authoritie of Euſebius: who auoucheth Pſal. 78. 51. 105. 23. 27. 106. 22.

auoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynasty, I can well beleeue; assenting so farre to Reineccius, who thinkes the Dynasties were named onely according to the seuerall seates of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Ægypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Osiris.

THe death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainely affirme. The onely coniecture that I know is made thus: Lehabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybius, made warre in Italy, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeere of Baleus King of Assyria: before which yeere he had made many great warres in Ægypt, Phœnicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and hauing ended his Ægyptian warres, left the Kingdome to Orus. Thus farre Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdome of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon inferres, that sixe yeeres may be allowed to the warres, which Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Ægyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris haue beene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 297. yeeres. I thinke that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholler than Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Nauigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would haue beene required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtlesse) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had beene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel haue come into Ægypt but seuen yeeres before the death of Osiris: and haue liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleeued. For it was the same king who aduanced Ioseph, bade him send for his Father; and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funerall: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reigne of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seuenth yeere of Israels comming into Ægypt: we must needes cut off 23. yeeres from that number, which Krentzhemius coniectures his reigne to haue continued: namely seuen which hee should haue liued after Iacobs comming into Ægypt; nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers comming: and other seuen in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Iosephs aduancement.

Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 1. Plut. l. de Iſid. & Oſid.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italie, is said to haue indured 10. yeers: After which proportion we may well giue not onely sixe yeers, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeeres, which passed betweene the time of Iosephs being sold into Ægypt, vnto his aduancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, & whose daughter he may seeme to haue married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to haue beene, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Ægypt, as the tyrannous vsurpation of Typhon must needes haue brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulnesse to Orus, the sonne of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioseph, and finding him a iust man, and one vnder whose hand al things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Iosephs hands, than vnto any of his Ægyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-harted, or weake and vnlucky in the troublesome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be obiected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further and say, That when the saying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants; then Putiphar Priest of On, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, and his iniurious imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife; and being old, resigned his office of chiefe Steward vnto him; who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did fauour the Priests, when he bought the lands of all other Ægyptians. This might appeare to some a tale not vnlike to the friendly booke of Aſenath, Putiphars daughter: but vnto ſuch as conſider that God workes vſually by meanes: and that Putiphar was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Iacob died: it would ſeeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of ſufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he ſhould haue ſpent 42. yeeres after he left Ægypt, ere he began in Italie, it is a circumſtance which (the length of his Italian wars conſidered, and his former enterpriſes and atchieuements proportioned to them) doth not make againſt vs, but for vs: or if it were againſt vs, yet could it not ſo weaken our ſuppoſition, as theſe probabilities collected out of the vndiſputable truth of Scripture doe confirme it. Neuertheleſſe I freely grant that all theſe proofes are no other, than ſuch as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in ſuch obſcurity, otherwiſe than by likelihoods, anſwerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Seſoſtres, ſucceſſiuely reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Seſoſtres.

CONcerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I finde none that preciſely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giueth three yeeres to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is ſo peremptorie without proofe, as if his owne word were ſufficient authority, in many points very queſtionable; alleadging no witneſſe, but as it were ſaying, Teſte me ipſo: yet herein we may thinke him to ſpeake probably, foraſmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very ſoone vndertake his Fathers reuenge: and was not long in performing it: and that leauing Ægypt to his brother, he followed other warres, in the ſame quarrell, as hath beene ſhewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Beroſus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet ſeeing Auentinus a follower of Beroſus hath it ſo, I will alſo beleeue it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules, ſeuen yeeres were ſpent, howſoeuer diuided betweene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus ſeuen yeeres after the death of Oſiris: forgetting to ſet downe his reaſons, which in a matter ſo probable I thinke he wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90. yeeres of the eighteenth Dynaſtie to Oſiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it ſeemes that the reigne of Orus laſted 115. yeeres. From the death of Orus to the departure of Iſrael out of Ægypt, there paſſed 122. yeeres by our account: who (according to Beroaldus and others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Floud to the birth of Abraham ——— 352.

From that time to the { vocation of Abraham ——— 75.
departure out of Ægypt ——— 430.

Summa ——— 857:

which ſumme diuers other wayes may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Ægypt, there doe remaine (as is aforeſaid) onely 122. yeeres from the death of Orus: we are now to conſider how many of them are to be allowed vnto Seſoſtris or Seſonchoſis: who is placed next vnto Orus, by authority of the Scholiaſtes Apollonij: not without good probability. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Hiſtories recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Aſia: to haue built a fleet of ſhips on the red Sea: and ſo to haue entred into India: likewiſe with another fleet on the middle-earth Seas, to haue paſſed into Europe, and ſubdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Iuſtine erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Iuſtine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Seſoſtris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient then was Oſiris (otherwiſe Mizraim) a thing altogether vnlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Ægypt into Aſia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, tooke Gezer, and gaue it to his daughter: (as wee may reade more at large in the holy hiſtorie of the Bible) after which time Seſac oppreſſed Rehoboam, and Necho fought paſſage through the land of Iſrael, when hee made his expedition againſt the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of queſtion, that neither of them was the great King Seſoſtris. Of Seſac it is doubted by ſome, foraſmuch as he came into Iudea with with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaueth it vndecided; vnleſſe it be ſufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himſelfe placeth Seſoſtris next to Orus: following the Scholiaſtes Apollonij. But further anſwere may be made to ſhew that they were not one. For, as Iuſtine witneſſeth, Seſoſtris, otherwiſe Vexoris, made warre on people farre remoued, abſtaining from his neighbours. Seſac came vp purpoſely againſt Hieruſalem. Seſoſtris, as Diodorus witneſſeth, had but 24000. horſe: Seſac had 60000. Seſoſtris had 8020. Chariots, Seſac but 1200. Seſoſtris made his expedition for no priuate purpoſe, but to get a great name: Seſac, as moſt agree, had no other purpoſe then to ſuccour Ieroboam, and giue him countenance in his new reigne; whom he had fauoured euen againſt Salomon: therefore Seſoſtris muſt needes haue reigned whileſt Iſrael abode in Ægypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: becauſe thoſe Hiſtorians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moueth me nothing. For Oſiris did ſucceede thoſe fifteene gods, namely, the twelue greater, and three leſſer: himſelfe alſo (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as alſo Menæus, and Menis, were titles of dignitie: though miſtaken by ſome as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni ſignifying an Arithmetician, which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Oſiris, who was a great Conquerour, Philoſopher, and benefactor to mankinde, by giuing good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In proweſſe and great vndertakings Seſoſtris was no whit inferiour to Oſiris. For he ſought victory not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and ſubmitted themſelues to his will and royall diſpoſition, leauing them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Ægypt. Soone vpon his returne he was endangered by a great Treaſon, the houſe in which hee was, being by his owne brother purpoſely fired: which neuertheleſſe he is ſaid to haue eſcaped, and to haue reigned in all thirtie three yeeres: after which time he choſe rather to die then to liue; becauſe he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Seſoſtris left a ſonne, whoſe name was Pheron or Pherones: who afterwards tooke the name of Seſoſtris; but was nothing like to his Father in glory; for he ſhortly fell blinde. The cauſe of his blindneſſe Herodotus attributes to his aſſaulting the Riuer Nilus with a iaueline: which tale Diodorus hauing likewiſe heard, yet reports as a fable, ſaying that perhaps he tooke the diſeaſe naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where expreſſed: yet foraſmuch as Orus the ſecond, (otherwiſe Buſiris) who ſucceeded him, began 14. yeeres after that this Seſoſtris had beene king, it muſt needes be that this reigned 14. yeeres at leaſt. That Buſiris began not vntill theſe 14. yeeres at leaſt were expired, the very account of time from the firſt of Buſiris, to the departure of Iſrael out of Ægypt plainly ſhewes, being almoſt generally agreed vpon, to haue beene 75. yeeres. That none came betweene Seſoſtris the ſecond and Buſiris or Orus the ſecond, it ſtands onely vpon probabilities: which are theſe. After Seſoſtris had reigned ſomewhile, he fell blinde: after certaine yeeres he recouered his ſight, as is ſaid: which may haue beene true, but is more like to haue beene a fable: ſurely the manner of his recouery as it is ſet downe, is very fabulous: namely that by looking vpon a woman, or waſhing his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne husband, he got his ſight againe. As the time of his reigne, before his blindneſſe, and when he was well againe (if euer he were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeeres: ſo his workes which were great, doe much more ſtrongly argue, that his reigne was not very ſhort. His words are largely ſet downe by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may ſeeme to haue beene the finiſhing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and ſluces of Nilus: whom I thinke he rather frighted, (as his Father had done) with ſpades and ſhouels, then with darts, and iauelins; and by his diligent ouer-ſight of that worke, was like enough to loſe both his eye-ſight and his peoples loue; whom his Father had very buſily employed in exceſſiue labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Busiris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queene Thermutis that tooke vp Moses out of the water.

AND herein (if I may presume to coniecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king, is like to haue dealt with him, as Ieroboam did with the sonne of Salomon. For that Busiris himselfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, it well appeared, by the drudgerie wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesostris, as Ieroboam was by Salomon, in the ouersight of those businesses, he had good opportunitie to worke his greatnesse with the king by industry: and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king: as Ieroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: vnlesse hee haue either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreouer he sought to deriue all the paine and labour of publique workes from the Ægyptians, to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his owne people was very plausible: who (as appeares in Exodus) were nothing slacke in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busiris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers; who also thinke that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinkes him Author of the bloudy edict. Neuertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne fiue yeeres after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Bunting thinkes to haue lasted 87. yeers, ere the departure out of Ægypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindnesse of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroyes in Ægypt was; & how great confidence the kings did put in them; seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Ægypt, and all the Ægyptians for bread; giuing at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Ægyptians cried out vpon Pharaoh, for bread; Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph; what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to haue gouerned himselfe, would giue such trust, & soueraigne authority; it is not vnlikely that a blind Prince should doe it to a man of especiall reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdome to him, though his reigne was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did vsurpe the kingdo.ne, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busiris were onely Regent, whilst the king liued, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, vsing at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeeres which passed betweene the beginning of Sesostris his reigne, & the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remaine, are to be accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeeres, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors herein approue. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeeres: Her name was Thermutis Pharei, or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. cals her Acencris: & out of Artabanus his History Meris: Ioseph cals her both Acenchere, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that shee was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenoph, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius & others:

but

but whether he were a king or onely a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Ægyptians called rather the neece or grand-childe, then the daughter of Paraoh, because of the glory of Sesostris, and the disreputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was shee both daughter, grand-childe, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and suruiuing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeeres. But if she were daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too yong to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was, vnder whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

SHe had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius; but his linage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned nine yeeres: after whom Chencres, thought to be his sonne, reigned ten yeeres, and then perished in the red Sea. During the reigne of Chencres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon Io: of which Historie elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom some call Acencheres: but all or most doe stile Ἀντίθεον, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeeres; and then Cherres 15. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Ægypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not vnlikely: viz. That Ægypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the later of whom, or his posterity seemes to haue taken all from Cherres the grand-childe of Chencres. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned foure yeeres after Cherres: and Armesis one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne said to haue beene fiue yeeres. His name is called Armeus, otherwise Danaus: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Iulia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Ægyptus or Rameſſes who gaue name to the Countrie, hauing expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermneſtra.	Danaus or Armeus expelled by his brother Ægyptus, after hee had reigned fiue yeers, became king of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermneſtra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephewes sons of Epaphus should haue occupied the kingdome after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himselfe is reported by Eusebius to haue beene borne in the time of Chencres. But forasmuch as the Historie of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus & Ægyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-childe of Chencres. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very yong, it appeares by the Historie of these two brethren, Danaus and Ægyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sonnes: perhaps, or rather questionlesse by diuers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did succeede Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approuing him) reigned fiue yeeres. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68. yeeres. This Rameſſes or Ægyptus is that Armeſeſmiamum or Armeſeſmiamus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Moſes was borne: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moſes, Goe, returne to Ægypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceiues, that it was one and the same king vnder whom Moſes was borne, and vnder whom he slew the Ægyptian at the 40. yeere of his age: and fled into the wildernesse, and there abode for feare: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common errour, he placeth one Alisfragmuthoſis (whose name is found in the list of Ægyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeeres more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successours from Themoſis (whom Eusebius cals Amoſis) downewards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Moſes borne vnder Armeſeſmiamum: and Israel deliuered in the dayes of his sonne Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthoſis seemes to him with little alteration to sound like Pharatates, of which name one was though to haue flourished either as a king, or a wise man about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthoſis to Phragmuthoſis, Pharmuthoſis, or Pharatates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable workes: yet my assent herein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Chencres was King who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place, Exod. 4, all are dead, &c. may better be vnderstood of Buſiris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, Saint Cyrill in his first booke against Iulian the Apoſtata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moſes was 120. yeeres old: Rameſſes, which was this Armeſeſmiamum, being then king of Ægypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeeres: who is thought by Mercator and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laied open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and here to speake of that great deliuerance of Israel out of Ægypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly ouerpasse.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuery of Iſrael out of Ægypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moſes birth, and how long the Iſraelites were oppreſſed in Ægypt.

TRue it is that the Hiſtorie it ſelfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moſes his birth, who was the excellent and famous inſtrument of this and other great workes of the Higheſt, the different opinions are verie neere as many, as the men that haue written of that Argument.

L. Viues in his annotations vpon Saint Auguſtine citeth very many of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moſes liued in the time of Semiramis: but if hee did meane the firſt Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for beſides that the ſame is contrarie to all Stories Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued, ſhee commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof abſolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while ſhe ruled, in rerum natura.

A ſecond opinion hee remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolomie a Prieſt of Mendes, who ſaith that Moſes was borne while Inachus did rule the Argiues, and Ameſis in Ægypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke Hiſtorie the firſt booke: that Moſes was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Aſſyrius, who though hee cite ſome authorities, that Moſes liued after the Troian warre, is himſelfe of opinion, that Moſes was farre more ancient, prouing it by many arguments.

Fiftly, he ſetteth downe the teſtimonie of Numenius the Philoſopher, who tooke Muſæus and Moſes to be one: confirming the ſame out of Artapanus, who confeſſeth that Moſes was called Muſæus, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Ægypt: the ſame which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Euſebius alſo affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his firſt booke de bono, Moſes vir Deo coniunctiſsimus is called Muſæus Iudæorum. Euſebius in his Chronologie, findes that Moſes was borne while Amenophis ruled Ægypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which liued at Moſes birth, Thumoſis or Thmoſis: the ſame perchance which Appion the Grammarian will haue to bee Amoſis, and elſewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethoſis: to whom Lyſimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gaue the name of Boccboris. To me it ſeemes moſt probable, that while Saphrus, called alſo Spherus or Iphereus, gouerned Aſſyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criaſus the Argiues; that then (Seſoſtris the ſecond ruling in Ægypt) Moſes was borne. For if wee beleeue S. Auguſtine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moſes led Iſrael out of Ægypt. Eduxit Moſes ex Ægypto populum Dei nouiſsimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium regis: Moſes (ſaith he) led the people of God out of Ægypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this ſort therefore is the time of Moſes birth, and of his departure out of Ægypt beſt proued. S. Auguſtine affirmes (as before remembred) that Moſes was borne: Saphrus gouerning Aſſyria: and that hee left Ægypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeeres; his ſucceſſor Mamelus 30. yeeres; Sparetus after him 40. yeeres: in whoſe fourth yeere Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Aſcatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moſes being borne while Saphrus ruled Aſſyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criaſus Argos (for theſe three kings liued at once at his birth, ſaith S. Auguſtine, as Cecrops did when he departed Ægypt) it will follow that the birth of Moſes was in the ninteenth yeere of the Aſſyrian Saphrus: for take one yeere remaining of 20. (for ſo long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeeres of Mamelus; melus, and the 40. yeres of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three yeeres of Cecrops his 50. yeres: then take nine yeeres out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparetus successour, those nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Ægypt: and adde these nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50: and so it falleth right with S. Augustines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Ægypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppreſt in Ægypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine yeeres before the birth of Moses, & 54. yeere, or rather more, after Ioseph: betweene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeeres: some of which time, and 80. yeeres after, they liued in great seruitude and miserie. For as it is written in Exodus: They set taske-masters ouer them, to keepe them vnder with burdens: and they built the Cities, Pithom and Ramases, &c. And by cruelties they caused the children of Israel to serue; and made them weary of their liues, by sore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vpon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisedome of God appointed: euen from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when it hast lasted 2370. yeeres, to the eightieth yeere of Moses, and vntill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which hee performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliuer of Ægypt, may the better bee vnderstood, I thinke it necessary to speake a few words of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Ægypt, mentioned in this Storie, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

THis Citie which the Hebrewes call Zoan, was built seuen yeeres after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie; the Septuagint, Tanis, Iosephus, Protaidis; after the name of an Ægyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of Thanis; Hegesippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adioyneth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Ægyptian and Iewish Idolatry.

Zoan or Tahnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Ægypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not vnlikely to be same Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did reade Astronomie in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetates King of Ægypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Ægyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Iunius, and our English call it On; and Ptolomie, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Ægypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelusium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the riuer Traian, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Auen. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same, which Pomp. Mela, and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy Warre, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simeon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adioyning Iacob inhabited, while hee liued in Ægypt. In the confines of this Citie, Onias, the high Priest of the Iewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferiour to that of Hierusalem (Ptolomie Philopater then gouerning in Ægypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. yeeres after the foundation by Onias, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth, herein to haue fulfilled a prophecie of Esai. c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terræ Ægypti; In that day shall the Altar of the Lord bee in the middest of the Land of Ægypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing ouer the Iewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Ægypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saniour Christ Iesus remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (saith Brochard) the fountaine taine is still found, called Iesus Well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Ægypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Ægypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembred by Esai and Ezekiel; the same which Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph: which later name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, so called, which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is know ne to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldæans name it Alchahyr; and Tudalensis Mizraim. Esa.19.13. Ezech.34. Hosea 9.6. Lib.2.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English write, Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrius witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrius) quæ olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium. G.Tyr.l.20.c. 17.lib.22.5.

The Citie of No, the Septuagint call Diospelis. Of which name there are two or three in Ægypt. Hierome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future. Ezc 30.15.16.

Bubastus, (for so Hierome and Zeigler doe write it) is the same which the Hebrewes call Pibeseth. Ezc.30.17.

To make the storie the more perceiueable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Heliopolis or Bethsemes, Balsephon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stonie. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retaine, what wee reade, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driuen to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who in his Preface to the Storie of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum obseruatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine Topographiæ cognitione historiæ legantur, adeò confusa atq; perturbata erunt omnia, vt ex ijs nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration (saith he) bee made of those things which are performed, without the obseruation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories bee read without Topographicall knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficultie.

§. III.

Of the crultie against the Israelites young children in Ægypt: and of Moses his preseruation, and education.

BVt to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slauery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented pouertie, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill resolued to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soone as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, qua præerant (saith Commestor) multitudini obstetricum, who had command giuen them ouer all mid-wiues; by whom (as it seemeth) hee gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the midde-wiues of Ægypt together, had beene a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrewes, or of the Ægyptians, it is diuersly disputed. S. Augustine calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Ægypt commanded the Mid-wiues of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Abulensis, and Pererius beleeue them to be Ægyptians. Whosoeuer they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witnesse both the wickednesse of the Egyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with pietie, & the feare of God, commanded Vers.16. Ioseph.ant.l.2. c.5. Abul.& Pere. in Exod.

commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publikely, or howsoeuer, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom hee might haue assured, by affoording them the iustice, which euery King oweth to his vassals, and the rest hee might haue imployed or sent away at his pleasure; Ioſephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be borne a childe; who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrary to the lawes of Heauen and of nature) he stretched out his bloudie and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue beene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtered. And that Pharooh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the fift of Exodus: Come, let vs worke wisely with them, lest they multiplie; and it come to passe, that if there be warre, they ioyne themselues also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wisedome of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they relie on the inuentions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearely beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods maruellous workes taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princesse hauing beheld the childe his forme and beautie, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as shee did not onely preserue it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, she called the childe Moſes, as it were, extractus, or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Ioſephus and Glicas, Moy, a voyce expressing water, and hises, as much to say, as that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moſes was circumcised, before hee was put into the Arke of Reedes, & that Amram his father had named hm Ioachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, & at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educauit, præfectis ei sapientibus Ægyptiorum Magistris, à quibus erudiretur, saith Basil; Vnto whom shee gaue princely education, appointing ouer him wise Masters of the Ægyptians for his instructers. Thereby (say Ioſephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Ægyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen, in the seuenth of the Acts confirmeth; And Moſes was learned in all the wisedome of the Ægyptians. Which wisedome or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, wee haue added, betweene the death of Moſes, and the reigne of Ioſua.

Phil. de vita Moysi.

§. IIII.

Of Moses his flying out of Ægypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre in Æthiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastorall life: and that of Pererius of the Bookes of Genesis and Iob.

When Moſes was growne to mans estate, Ioſephus and Euſebius, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeeres warre that he made against the Æthiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyſes, called Meroe; and how he recouered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a daughter of Æthiopia, whom he tooke to wife. So hath Commestor a prettie tale of Moſes, How after the end of that warre, Tharbis resisting his returne into Egypt, Moſes most skilfull in Astronomie, caused two Images to bee ingraued in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memorie; the other caused forgetfulnesse. These he set in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of obliuion, to his wife Tharbis, reseruing the other of memorie for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulnesse, after she had a while worne, she began to neglect the loue shee bare her husband: and so Moſes without danger returned into Egypt. But leauing these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeere of Moſes age, when hee beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moued by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred vp by disdaine against the other, in the contention hee slew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, whose chosen seruant hee was, he fled into Arabia Petræa, the next bordering Countrie to Egypt; where wandring all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vnknowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconciliable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few sheep, & the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occasion whereby to prouide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countrie neerest Egypt, fittest to returne from: necessarie to be knowne, because interiacent betweene Egypt and Iudæa, through which hee was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best serued. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Desarts, there the glorie of God, which shineth most, couered him ouer, and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopted childe of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble sheepe-heard, sitting at a mountaines foot; a keeper and commander of those poore beasts onely.

In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, he consumed 40. yeeres. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flockes, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastorall knowledge; yet in that solitary Desart hee enioyed himselfe: and being separate from the preasse of the world, and the troublesome affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeeres had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also iudging, that his Pastorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principalitie, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi præludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia præexercent se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quàm pacis tempore. At verò præfectura mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoq; Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contumelia sed honoris gratia; The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introductorie exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Euen as warlike natures doe before-hand exercise themselues in hunting, practising on wilde beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affoording matter, wherein to traine themselues, both in time of warre and of peace. But the gouernment of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subiects; therefore, Kings are stiled sheep-heards of the people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob was at that time liuing. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses while hee liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the booke of Genesis; although I cannot denie the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, put them in assurance of their deliuerie from the Ægyptian slauery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised. Perer. in 3. Exod.

Of his calling backe into Ægypt by the Angell of God, and the maruailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that hee was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name hee should make him knowne, and by whom he was sent; he receiued from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euer-being nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answere, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be vnderstood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the Eternall: which truely is; which is aboue all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutri-

Cætera quæ creata sunt, etiamsi videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit; It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is; for hee hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not beene, may againe want being.* And with this, in respect of the Diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura vmbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either emptie or deceitfull: in com-

The rest of the plagues by Frogges, Lice, Flyes, or stinging Waspes; by the death of their Cattaile; by leprous Scabbes, by Haile and Fire; by Grashoppers; by Darknesse; after which Pharaoh forbad Moses his presence: moued the hardned heart of the vnbeleeuing King no longer, then the paine and perill lasted; till such time as his owne first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood vpon no condition: whereas before, he first yeelded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reseruing their beastiall; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not onely depart with all their owne, but with a part of the Siluer, Gold, and Iewels of his owne people: of which (the feare being past) hee suddainly repented him, as his pursuit after them proued. For when euery one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses receiued) slaine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Passeuer, (a Sacrament of the most cleane and vnspotted Sauiour,) and with the bloud thereof coloured the poste and linterne of the doores; the Angel of God in the night smote euerie first-borne of Ægypt, from the sonne of the King, to that of the Begger and Slaue: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yeelded, as before is said, to their departure. The Ægyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with bloud, which the Is-

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

NOw, when the people were remoued, and on their way, (his heart being hardned by God) he bethought him as well of the Honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffring them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and in despight of himselfe. And hauing before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted with himselfe, what way the Israelites were like to take. Hee knew that the shortest and faire st passage was through the Countrey of the Philistims. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probabilitie of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to wit, through the Desart of Etham; and there, because the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard accesse, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, hee thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Ægypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines ouer them; hee determined to set vpon them in the plaines of Goſen, which way soeuer they turned themselues. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines vsed against the Romanes, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Armie of Pharaoh, Iosephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. foot; which, were it true, then it cannot bee doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Goſen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Armie, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things; eyther that the Hebrewes might ioyne themselues to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leaue his seruice, and get themselues thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieued him withall, enforst him at this time to giue an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise; and Iosephus partiall in this affaire, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Ægypt: which could not bee done in haste. For Moſes made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on sixteene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattell and Sheepe with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemie at hand. Now, as Moſes well knew, that hee went out with a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his Enterprizes: so hee lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vsing the vnderstanding which God had giuen him, hee left nothing vnperformed, becomming a Wise man, and a valiant and skilfull Conducter; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death well appeared.

Exod. 14. v. 7.

Exod. 14. 7.

When Moſes perceiued that Pharaoh was enraged against him, & commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passeouer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rende-vous of al the Hebrews at Ramaſes in the Territorie of Goſen; a Citie standing indifferent to receiue from all parts of the Coutnry the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue commandement, that euery Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dow, and Paste, not staying to make it into bread; knowing then that Pharaoh was on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moſes was vtterly vnprouided (though as it is written, the Israelites went vp armed) he marched from Ramaſes East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which hee performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the yeere. Whether in former times they had beene accustomed to begin their yere in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Ægyptians, and were now recalled by Moſes to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is vncertain. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politicke yeere, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vse. Wherefore in referring things done, or hapning among them, vnto the beginning, middest, or ending of the yere; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politike yeere is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euery Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeere, like enough it is that Moſes himselfe in forty yeres space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was giuen in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar, was made publike, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I do not finde. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew heere at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew yeere: with the difference betweene them and other Nations, in ordering the accompt of time.

The territorie of Goſen was afterward called Ramaſes, after the name of this City, as appeareth in Gen. 47. & Num. 33. Exod. 13.

Of the Solarie and Lunarie yeeres: and how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

The first Moneth, Nisan, or Abib.	1. March.
The second, Iar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.	2. April.
The third, Sivan, or Sinan, or Siban.	3. May.
The fourth, Tamuz.	4. June.
The fifth, Ab.	5. Iulie.
The sixth, Ebul.	6. August.
The seuenth, Tysri, or Ethanim, or Ethanim.	7. September.
The eighth, Marchesuan, or Mechasuan, or Bul, or with Iosephus, Marsonane.	8. October.
The ninth, Chisleu, or Casleu.	9. November.
The tenth, Tebeth, or Thobeth.	10. December
The eleuenth, Sebeth, or Sabath.	11. Ianuarie.
The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.	12. February.

1. Asts 4.

VE Adar was an intercalarie Moneth, added, some yeeres, vnto the other twelue, to make the Solarie and Lunarie yeere agree; which (besides the generall inconuenience that would otherwise haue risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine Precept. For God appointed especiall Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a set day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not haue so beene kept, if eyther the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe beene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeere.

Deut 16.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertaine all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commoditie of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driuen in like manner to make their yeeres vnequall, by adding sometimes, & sometimes abating one or more dayes, as the error committed in foregoing yeres required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made vp a compleat yere. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most sauage of all people, when a yere hath passed ouer them; yet the necessitie of ordinarie occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole yeres insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therfore men obserued the Monethly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeere into twelue parts, subdiuiding the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and those againe into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the vnderstanding. Twelue reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by 11. daies or thereabout, than the yerely course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of sixteene yeeres, euery moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeere, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the yeere, making it to consist of twelue Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yeerely reuolution by any set number of whole dayes; neyther did the Moone change alwaies at one houre; but the verie minutes and lesser fractions were to be obserued by him, that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

30. & 29.

Heere lay much wisedome and deepe Art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the yere to containe three hundred and sixtie daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Gracian yeere (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifest by that which Plinie directlie affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Plin. l. 34. c. 6.

Demetrius Phalereus, which were (ſaith he) 360. whileſt as yet the yeere exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neyther did any certaine age of the Moone begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeeres, in their owne places: but muſt needs be ſhifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inſerted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the ſuperiour bodies in their courſes, ſhould occupie their owne roomes in their due turnes. Now, becauſe the ſolemnitie of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Hecatombeon (which anſwereth in a manner to our Iune) they were carefull to take order, that this Moneth might euer beginne with the new Moone; which they effected by adding ſome two daies to the laſt Moneth of euery yeere; thoſe Games being held once in foure yeres. This intercalation ſufficed not to make the matter euen; which cauſed them ſometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the ſecond of the Moneth Boedromion; (agreeing neerely with our Auguſt) ſometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to inſert another for it in their fourth Lunary yere, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithſtanding, their Moneth of Iune would euery yeere haue growne colder and colder, had they not ſought to keepe all vpright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere one whole Moneth, which they called the ſecond Poſideon or December; which was the deuice of Harpalus, who alſo taught them to make one Moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. daies, and ſo ſucceſſiuely through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeere as neere as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but theſe markes which they obſerued, were found at length to be deceitfull Guides. For it was not poſſible ſo to faſhion this eighth yeeres intercalation, that it ſhould not deceiue them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the leaſt, or ſome waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confuſion. The firſt that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeeres intercalation, deuiſed a Cycle of 19. yeeres, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne out her circuit, met with the Sunne in the ſame place, and on the ſame day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before paſt ſhee had done. This inuention of Meton was entertained with great applauſe, and paſſing from Greece to Rome, was there inſerted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were auoyded the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had been vſed; for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeeres, all was ſo euen, that no ſenſible difference could bee found. Yet that errour which in one yeere could not bee perceiued, was very apparent in a few of thoſe Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and ſome minutes of the preciſe rule. Therefore Calippus deuiſed a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to ſay, 76. yeres; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Aſtrologer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding ſome error in the former obſeruations, which they diligently corrected. The laſt reformation of the Kalendar was that which Iulius Caeſar made, who by aduice of the beſt Mathematicians, then to bee found, examining the courſes of thoſe heauenly bodies, reduced the yere vnto the forme which is now in vſe with vs, containing 365. daies and ſix houres, which houres in foure yeres make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yere, the 24 of February. The correction of the Iulian yeere by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall conſent; it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the worke of Ceſar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obſerued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entred the Æquinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yere 1582. ten daies ſooner found in that time, Pope Gregorie ſtrooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, ſo that in ſtead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which meanes the moueable Feaſts depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in ſuch time, as at the Nicene Councell they had beene. And the better to preuent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundreth yeere, the Leape day ſhould be omitted, excepting ſtill the fourth hundred: becauſe the Sun doth not in his yeerely courſe take vp full ſixe houres aboue the 365. daies; but faileth ſo manie minutes, as in 400. yeeres make about three whole dayes.

But the Cycle of 19. yeeres, which the Hebrewes vſed, was ſuch as neither did need any nice curioſitie of houres, minutes, and other leſſer Fractions to helpe it; neyther did in ſumming vp the dayes of the whole yeere, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out ſo, that alwayes the Kalendæ or firſt day of the Moneth was at the new Moone, and becauſe that day was feſtiuall, they were very carefull as well to obſerue the ſhort yeere of the Moone, paſſing through all the 12 Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. Firſt, therefore they gaue it to Niſan their firſt Moneth, which is about our March or Aprill, 30. dayes; to Iar their ſecond Moneth 29. dayes; and ſo ſucceſſiuely 30. to one, 29. to another. Heereby it came to paſſe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained ſomewhat euenly two reuolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The ſpare minutes were beſtowed among the ſuperfluous or Epact dayes; which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. yeres; to 6. of which 7. were commonly giuen 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwiſe as was found requiſite. Their common yeere (as appeareth by the ſeuerall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the yere, wherein the Sunne finiſheth his courſe, 11. whole dayes, with ſome fractions of time. But theſe dayes, and other broken pieces, howſoeuer they were neglected in one yeere, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeeres were ſo diſpoſed of by conuenient intercalations, that ſtill at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the ſame day of the yere, Moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the ſame houre of the day, where they had beene at the beginning of it 19. yeeres before.

Diuers haue diuerſly ſet downe the forme of the Hebrew yeere, with the manner of their Intercalations. Sigonius tells vs, that euery ſecond yeere they did adde a Month of 22. dayes; euerie fourth yeere a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeere of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceiued. For the Moone doth neuer finiſh her courſe in 22. or 23. dayes: and therfore to haue added ſo many dayes to the end of the yeere, had beene the way to change the faſhion of all the Moneths in the yeeres following, which could not haue begun as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard ſaith, that euery third yeere, or ſecond yeere, as need required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeres end vnto the other 12. This I beleeue to haue beene true; but in which of the yeeres the intercalation was (if it be worthy of conſideration) me thinkes they doe not probably deliuer, who keepe all farre from euenneſſe vntill the very laſt of the 19. yeeres. For (to omit ſuch as erre groſſely) ſome there are who ſay, that after three yeeres, when beſides the dayes ſpent in 36. courſes of the Moone, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeere; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were in pluſſage vnto the next account. The like, ſay they, was done at the end of the ſixt yeere; at which time, beſides the Intercalarie Moneth, remained ſixe daies, namely, three ſurmounting that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeeres, beſides the three formerly reſerued. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeere; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeere, make vp a Moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all euen.

Sig. de rep. Heb. lib. 3. c. 1.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor denie, yet ſurely it muſt needs haue bred a great confuſion, if in the 18. yeere euery Moneth were remooued from his owne place by the diſtance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeere and more; which inconuenience by ſuch a reckoning was vnauoydable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth ſuch diſlocation of the Moneths, by ſetting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yere. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and ſixt yeres, added vnto the 22. daies, ariſing out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. yeres, doe fitly ſerue to make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yere following; and this borrowing of two daies is ſo farre from cauſing any diſorder, that indeed it helpes to make the yeeres enſuing vary the leſſe from the proper ſeaſon of euery Moneth. This may ſuffice to bee ſpoken of the Hebrew Moneths and yeeres, by which they guided their accounts,

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Ægypt.

FRom Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desart of Etham, to recouer the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse then to goe out of that way, of all other the neerest. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbare to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of aboue a Million, if not two Millions of soules, (for as it is written, Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those desart and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should haue ouer taken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult: by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, onely wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, cõsisting of 600000 men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. miles distant; and sate downe betweene two ledges of Mountaines adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, & Baalzephon towards the South: the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus speculæ, siue custodiæ; Lord of the watch-towre. For the Ægyptians beleeued, or at least made their slaues beleeue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Ægyptians had gods for all turnes. Ægyptij dij fœcundi; The Ægyptians were fruitfull in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who incamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towre asleepe, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all those Ægyptians and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage vp and downe, then that it is any proper name.

Now these two passages leading out of Ægypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Peluſium and Caſiotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Iudæa, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, betweene the Mountaines, which made a streight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate sight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brinke and wash of the Sea: insomuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, began to despaire, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselues foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the booke of Wisedome; is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despaire in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

Cap. 17. 11.

§. VIII.

Of their passage ouer the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it selfe.

BVt Moses who feared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnesse, who hath neuer abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; vsing this comfortable and resolued speech: Exod.14.v.13 Feare not, &c. for the Ægyptians whom ye haue seene this day, ye shall neuer see them againe. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, receiued encouragement, and commandement to goe on in these words: Exod.14.v.16 Wherefore cryest thou vnto me? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward; and lift thou vp thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it, and let the children of Israel goe on dry ground through the middest of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the darke of the night finding the sands vncouered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne winde, and by Moses rod to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him euen at the heeles, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angell of God which went before the Host of Israel, remoued, and went behinde them; also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behinde them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministery of his Angell, to interpose his defence betweene the Hebrewes and their E- Iosua 24.v.7. nemies; to the end that the Ægyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmefull speede. But in the morning watch Moses seized the other banke of Arabia side: and Pharaoh (as the dawne of day began to illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Seas return, hasted himselfe towards his own Coast: Exod.14.v.27 But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moued by the power of God, ran backe towards the land with vnresistable furie and swiftnesse, and ouerwhelmed the whole Armie of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheeles, that is, when the waters began to couer the sands, the Ægyptians being stricken with feare of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheeles stucke fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea comming against them with supernaturall violence.

Lyranus vpon *Exod.*14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, conceiued, that after Moses had by the power of God diuided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Iuda first made the aduenture, and that therefore was that Tribe euer after honored aboue the rest, according to the prophecie of Iacob, *Gen.*49.8. Thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe vnto thee. But Hierome vpon the 11. of Hosee condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Iuda had the first place in all their marches in the Desart, and, as we now call it, led the Vantgard, (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himselfe was the Conducter of Israel at that time, it is generally receiued. For, as it is written in the 77. Psalme: Thou didst leade thy people like sheepe by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrewes haue also another fancie, that the Red Sea was diuided into twelue parts, and that euery Tribe past ouer in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalme according to the vulgar: Diuisit mare rubrum in diuisiones; He diuided the Red Sea in diuisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a greene Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, fauouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelue Pillars, nor twelue Armies of the Ægyptians. It is written in 77. Psalme, *v.*16. Thy way is in the Sea, not thy wayes; and in the last of the booke of Wisedome, *vers.*7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chenchres, perished in the 16. yeere of his reigne, is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third booke noteth, and our selues know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait betweene Arabia the Happy and Æthiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolomie calleth Possidium, to the other Land of Æthiopia, hath not aboue sixe leagues in breadth, and the same also filled euery where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth vp between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petræa, on one side, and Æthiopia and Ægypt on the other, as far as Sues, the vttermost end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses past, is called Heropolites of the Citie Hero; sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Plinie cals it Cambisu, by which name it was knowne, saith he, before it was called Hero many yeeres. Plin. l. 6. c. 29. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Alemiticum: King Iuba Laniticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolomie, Elana: Plinie, Lana: Iosephus, Ilana, and Marius Niger, Aila: there is also Ilalah in Assyria, to which Salmanassar carryed the Israelites captiue, Kings 2. c. 8. v. 11. which Ilalah in Assyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the first of Chron. the 5. Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuersly named, the Moores and Arabians (Vassals to the Turke) know it by no other appellation, then the Gulfe of Meca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythræum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythræus: and because Erythros in the Greeke signifieth Red: hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythræus, the sonne of Perseus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quin. Curtius coniectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirme. 3 Kings 9. Ios. Ant. 8. c. 2. Arian. de gest. Alex. Mag. l. 8 Strabo. l. 6. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discouery of that Sea in the yeere 1544. performed by Steuen Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of redness, both from the banks, clifts, and sands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Castro, a principall Commander vnder Gama (which discourse I gaue Master Richard Hacluit to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalaqua, sometime Leques, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth; the earth, sands, and clifts, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the clifts and bankes are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beames, giue a kinde of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corrall growes, which is carryed into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those growing vnder water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of redness by the shaddowes of these stones, sands, earth, and clifts, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Iohannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana or Ezion Gaber adioyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which washeth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some three Leagues or nine English miles ouer, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. haue nine miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Ægypt and Arabia, thrust themselues into the Sea, & streighten it so fast, as for sixe miles together it is not aboue three miles ouer; from thence vpward the land on Ægypt side, falleth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Coue for some ten miles together, after which the land growes vpon the Sea againe, and so bindes it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer-against Elana or Toro, but without iudgement: for from Ramases to Pihacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not aboue 30. miles interiacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past ouer in three dayes: and betweene the land of Ægypt opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is aboue 80. miles. For Ramases, to which Citie Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when hee left Pharao at Zoan, and tooke his last leaue, standeth in 30. degrees fiue minutes of Septentrionall Latitude; and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountaine Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twentie and a halfe, which made a difference of fiue and thirtie English miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

THe Ægyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes haue obiected that Moses past ouer the Red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharao conducted more by furie then discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recouer the coast of Ægypt, he was ouer-taken by the floud and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that beleeue not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselues, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from aboue, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharao and all his Armie haue perished in that pursuit.

For whersoeuer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and run downeward towards the Ocean, leauing all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entring the Sea at Migdol vnder Baalzephon (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunity of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, ten or twelue miles farther into the Sea then Sues, and betweene it and where Moses past: who entred the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeue or Strait, had beene by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discouered, when Pharao found the floud increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Ægypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: & so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truely witnesse the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses past on betweene two Seas, and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, proue the cause to haue beene a power aboue nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Againe, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinarie: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but, in effect North and South. And it must haue beene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driuen those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South and maine body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being vnknowne to Pharao: while he was checkt by that Sea which vsed in all times before to ebbe away, the floud prest him and ouer-whelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Captaine, as he ouer-threw the Æthiopians in battels, being imployed by Pharao, and wanne diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this grossenesse, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which hee would there winne vpon Pharao) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water. For hee knew not the contrarie, but that Pharao might haue found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaos approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safetie: and when Moses prayed vnto God for helpe, hee was answered by God: Wherefore cryest thou vnto me? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift thou vp thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: which proues that there was not at the time of Pharaos approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands discouered themselues betweene the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, So that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Ægyptians could onely follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood vpright as wals doe, as some of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Ægyptians perceiued any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone haue quitted the chace and pursuit of Israël. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharaoh and the Ægyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heauenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Countrie, on his owne Coast, & in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens; and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of yeeres experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowne or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely; which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their owne prosperitie, they least discerne it comming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Armie of the Ægyptians had beene ouer-taken by the ordinary returne of the floud, before they could recouer their owne Coast; their bodies drowned would haue beene carryed with the floud which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not haue beene cast ashore on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-banke ouer against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary floud would haue carryed them: Which floud doth not any where crosse the Channell, and run athwart it, as it must haue done from Ægypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the bodies there; but it keepes the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carkasses should haue beene carried, if the worke had not beene supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Ægyptians which staied in the Countrie, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honor those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were busied at the time of Pharaohs destruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a god of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupyed: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be giuen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tels vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. yeeres after Christ, the prints of Pharaohs Chariot wheeles were to be seene at a low water on the Ægyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared againe. But hereof I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe. Cap. 14. v. 21.

Chap. IV.

Of the iournying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BVt to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeere of the World 2434. Saphrus then gouerning Assyria; Orthopolis Sycionia, or Peloponnesus; Criasus the Argines; Orus Ægypt, and Deucalion Thessalie: He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. yeeres, in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeeres after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Ægypt, and wrought Act. 7. Iosua 14. 2474.

2514. his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the yeere 2514. the last moneth of that yeere. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day (as Pag. 254. they) at Sunne setting, in the yeere of the World 2514. was the celebration of the Passeouer: and in the dead of the night of the same day were all the first-borne slaine through Ægypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrewes inhabited not. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrews called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeere of the World
Exod. 12. Num 33. 2514. Moses with the children of Israel remoued from the generall assembly at Ramases, and marched to Succoth.

Exod. 13. And departing thence they made their third Station at Etham: and iourneying from E-
Num 33. tham, they incamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, vnder the Mountaine Baal-
Exod. 14. zephon; and in the same night after mid-night, they past the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his
Num. 33. Armie perishing in their returne, about the first dawne of the day. Moses hauing recouered the bankes of Arabia, gaue thankes vnto God, for the deliuerie of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entred the Desarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur. But finding no
Num 33. water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desart of Etham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel prest with Exod 15. extreame thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaohs approach in
Num. 33. Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neere a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same thereinto, made the same sweet: a plaine type and figure of our Sauiour; who vpon the tree of the Crosse changed the bitternesse of euerlasting death into the sweetnesse of eternall life. Plinie remembers those bitter Fountaines in his sixth Booke and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Ægypt, Sesostris first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolomie the second, began to cut an artificiall Riuer, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to trade and nauigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Nilus. From Marah he remoued to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles:
Exod. 15. Num. 33. where finding twelue Fountaines of sweet water, and three-score and ten Palme trees, he rested diuers dayes.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Towne or Citie in Moses time, I cannot affirme. And yet the scarcitie of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly be left vnpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his Historie of the Holie Warre, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And Will. Tyr. l. 11 cap. 19. at such time as Baldwine the first past that way into Ægypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Ciuitatem antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum peruenisset, loci illius incolæ, Regis aduentu præcognito, nauiculam ingredientes, in mare vicinum se contulerunt, Entring Helim a very ancient Citie, well knowne sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants forewarned of the Kings approach, tooke Boate, and shifted themselues into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim he returned againe towards the South, and sate downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the seuenth Mansion. For it seemeth that hee had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountring with the least miserie, were more apt to returne to their quiet slauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vndertake or sustaine so dangerous an enemie: hee therefore made stay at this Mansion, vntill the fifteenth of this Exod. 16. second Moneth called Zim, or Iiar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desart of Zin; where the children of Israel mutined against Moses the third time, hauing want of food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retrait from Elim to the red Sea, but in the collection of euery seuerall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set downe.

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of Quailes, as all the Countrie about their incamping was couered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being Exod. 16. the sixteenth of their Moneth, which serued them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Ægypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattell, and Sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feede themselues with many of those: but reserued them both for the milke to releeue the children withall: and for breede to store themselues when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie miles: the one to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim sixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Ægypt, where they rather contented themselues to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casuall and sometime necessary want, and to vndergoe the hazzards and trauailes which euery manly minde seeketh after, for the loue of God, and their owne freedomes. But Moses with the same rod which he diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied. Exod.17.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethroes comming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

AND while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and ghessed that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrie (which being barren of it selfe, would be vtterly wasted by so great a multitude of People and Cattell) thought it most for their aduantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needefull for the life of man infeebled them. On the other side Moses perceiuing their resolutions, gaue charge to Iosua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to incounter Amalech. Exod.17. Betweene whom and Israel, the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrews and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulses for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God beene of farre greater force, and more preualent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly indangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnacquainted with scarcity of food, and those mindes whom a seruile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought againe to hazzard themselues.

After this victory, Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbare to conduct, or Moses to receiue, till hee had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v.1. when Iethro the Priest of Midian, Moses Father in law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech, gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel, being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and conrrouersies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Iudges v.11 & 17. it is manifest; where it is written; Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the sonne of Iethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocke. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giueth for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Ægypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the sixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they receiued from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when hee fled out of Ægypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had hee found them Idolaters) haue made Iethroes Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing C.15.v.16. Num.24.v.21 Sam.1.c.15. Gen.25.

the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis verse nineteenth, these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeede afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselues from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Kadesh. Againe, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abrahams other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

Gen. 15.

Iudg. 4.

Gen. 25. 4.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into fiue Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the Riuer Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neere the bankes of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the ouerthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to haue beene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petræa, were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not haue sent 12000. Israelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to haue destroyed that Madian, where his wiues kindred inhabited; seeing himselfe comming with 600000. able men, was encountred by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. yeeres.

That Iethro, or Iothor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English Reuel, Exodus 2.18. cals him Iethro, or Iothor, Exod. 3. & v. 1. c. 4. v. 18. & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10 & 12. and in Num. c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro & Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was giuen; with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

THe rest of the moneths of this yeere 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3, v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalme v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4.24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10. & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so is it in the first of Kings 8.6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4.4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48.7. they are named as one. Which heardest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius, who in the yeere 1588. past out of Ægypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and trauailed to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Pet. Bel. lib. 2. c. 62.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he incamped thereabout almost a yeere, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angell of God was giuen to Moses, where hee staied staied a whole yeere, wanting some ten or twelue dayes: for he remoued not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second yeere; and hee arriued about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kindes and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way dis-ioyned, hee may turne ouer a few leaues, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfullest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to gouern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed director of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conducter of all in general, to the hauen of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, & the very sinewes of euery Estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eie without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what hee hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the sonnes of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedæmonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes somtime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselues: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

THe word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and in an indifferent sense vsed. For if wee consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any priuate ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandements of Tyrants, which they cause to be obserued by force, for their decrees doe also vsurpe that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay, Woe vnto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Like wise, the word is vsed for the tumultuarie resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though euill and vnsufficient: Mala lex est, quæ tumultuariè posita est; It is an ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, eyther good or euill, are called by the name of Lawes. Esay 10. Ethic. l. 4. c. 1.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their patterne and plat-forme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem fomitis, is to be vnderstood. For euery law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as * elsewhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romanes it is called a Law: But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the Law of my minde, and leading me captiue vnto the law of sinne. Againe, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are sometime called lawes, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

a So Virgil, cõtinuò has leges æternas, fœdera certis imposuit natura locis; where also it is to bee noted that hee ioynes leges & fœdera together: as in the scripture the law is oftentimes called the couenant.

Alſo priuate contracts among Merchants and other Tradeſ-men, doe often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, preſcribing a neceſſarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill communitie. The reſt, to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentiæ magis quàm leges; rather compulſions then lawes: And whatſoeuer is not iuſt, S. Auguſtine doth not allow for lawes, howſoeuer eſtabliſhed: for he calls them iniqua hominum conſtituta, quæ nec curadiscenda, nec putanda ſunt; The vniuſt conſtitutions of men which are neither to bee termed nor thought lawes. For ſaith Ariſtotle, Legalia iuſta ſunt factiua, & conſeruatiua fœlicitatis; Iuſt lawes are the workers and preſeruers of happineſſe: becauſe by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life euerlaſting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, ſaith Plato, is God and his worſhip: Finis legis Deus & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is ſo called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia lectæ & ad populum latæ, ſaith Varro; For after Laws were written and publiſhed, all men might reade them, & behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no leſſe agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called alſo a yoke, and a band: as confregerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the ſecond Pſalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & proiciamus à nobis funes ipſorum; Let vs breake their bands in ſunder, and caſt away their cords from vs.

Ariſt. Ethic. 5. cap. 1. Plato in Dial. 2. de Leg. Hieren. 5. 5. Pſalm. 2.

The Couenant it is called, becauſe of the conditionall promiſes of God: and becauſe of Gods peoples voluntarie ſubmiſſion of themſelues vnto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes, vſe the word διαθηκη, a Teſtament or laſt Will: which name it hath, becauſe it is not otherwiſe effectuall for our ſaluation, but in reſpect of the death of the Teſtator; for without the death of the Teſtator, the Teſtament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is ſaid, Teſtamentum in mortuis ratum eſt.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, becauſe euery man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomos of diſtributing, becauſe it diſtributeth to euery man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: Iuſtice being an attribute proper vnto God himſelfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei eſt; The reigne of the law, is the reigne of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philoſophers: Lex eſt vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ ſunt ſequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to ſhunne: or Lex eſt omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queene or Princeſſe of things both humane and diuine. But this deſcription is grounded vpon the opinion of ineuitable fate. Law is the very wiſedome of Nature: the reaſon and vnderſtanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Index ſui & curui, the demonſtrance of it ſelfe, and of the crooked: ſo is the law, the iudge and meaſure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodneſſe of operation: and though law as touching the ſubſtance and eſſence, conſiſt in vnderſtanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is alſo diuerſly taken, as ſometime for the matter of the law and for common right: ſometime for the law it ſelfe: as Ius Ciuile, or Ius gentium. Iſidore diſtinguiſheth the two generall words Ius and Fas: whereof Ius, ſaith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goe ouer another mans field, is permitted, by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controuerſie, Virgil vſed both theſe words: as Fas & iura ſinunt, God and men permit.

Iſid. Etym.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the olde ſubſtantiue Nowne iuſſus, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke Ζευς, which is the name of Iupiter, or of the Latine genitiue caſe Iouis; becauſe as the Scripture ſpeakes, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that ius-iurandum came of Iouis-iurandum, (for ſo we finde it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which ſenſe the Scripture calls it iuramentum Iehouæ) ſo alſo we may ſay, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis eſt: becauſe as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, ſo alſo in his Vicegerents the Magiſtrates, hee is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this Ius the iuſt are denominated, iuſtus à iure, and iuſtitia à iuſto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iuſtice takes her name from the iuſt.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the law eternall.

BVt becauſe lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, firſt to diuide and diſtinguiſh them. I meane thoſe ſorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leauing the indiuiduals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confuſion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex æterna eſt æternus diuinæ ſapientiæ conceptus, ſecundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipſo præcognitarũ; The eternall law is the eternall conceipt of Gods wiſedome as it is referred to the gouernment of things foreknowne by himſelfe. Or Lex æterna eſt ſumma atque æterna ratio diuinæ ſapientiæ: quatenus res omnes ad deſtinatos fines ita dirigit, vt illis iuxta conditionem ipſarum modum aliquem neceſsitatis adferat; It is the high and eternall reaſon of diuine ſapience: as it directeth all things in ſuch ſort to their proper ends, impoſing a kinde of neceſsitie according to their ſeuerall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the ſame diuine vnderſtanding directs all theſe to their proper ends; ſo it is called prouidence: but as it impoſeth a neceſſity according to the natures of all things which it directs, ſo is it called a law. P. 2. q. 2. art. 1. Th. q. 36 art. 1

Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad rectè faciendum impellens & à delicto auocans: quæ non tum incipit lex eſſe cum ſcripta eſt: ſed tum cum orta eſt. Orta autem ſimul eſt cum mente diuina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum, ratio eſt recta ſummi Iouis; That perfect reaſon and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (ſaith he) then beginne to bee a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderſtanding, and therefore a true law and a fit Princeſſe to command and forbid, is the right reaſon of the moſt high God. This eternall law, (if we conſider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the ſame; the nature of God being moſt ſimple: but as it is referred to diuers obiects, ſo the reaſon of man findes it diuers and manifold. It alſo ſeemeth one law in reſpect of things neceſſarie, as the motions of the heauens; ſtabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwiſe to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all thoſe that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counſaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuerſall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the ſecond to the firſt.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in conſideration; the eternall directing more largely: aſwell euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his ſupernaturall: but the diuine law to a ſupernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a ſtreame from this fountaine. Th. & Aug.

The law humane or temporall is alſo thence drawn; in that it hath the forme of right reaſon: from which if it differ, it is then impoſitio iniqua, a wicked impoſition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are ſubiected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Directour: as, Psal.148. Praise him all yee his Angels; praise him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres: heauens of heauens, for he hath established them for euer & euer. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth yee Dragons and all Depths: Fire and haile, snow and vapours, stormie windes, which execute his Word: mountaines, and hils: fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicitie proposed vnto them (beatitude being both the attractiue, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselues, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, knowne cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heauy to fall downeward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatsoeuer is apposed. This kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a difference vsed in termes onely; it beeing no other then Gods generall prouidence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appeare in themselues thence deriued: there-vnder subiected: thence-from by his eternall law and prouidence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and obiect of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetition, to conduct them: so is the obiect and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex aterna est, qua iustum est vt omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order. L.1. de lib. arb. cap.6.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-Will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Padagogie of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should bee expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Sauior noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatum est. But I rather thinke these words of our Sauiour to haue no other signification, then that now the prophecie of their giuing him Vinegar to drinke was fulfilled. For so Saint Iohn expounds it, when he saith v.28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Vt consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Iewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisedome of Salomon, And beeing one shee can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all. Iohn 19.30. Psal.69.22.

§. VI.
Of the Law of Nature.

OF the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: onely as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aterne in rationali creatura. Vlpian defines the naturall law to be the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Ius naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and hee afterward addeth, Ius istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium qua terra marique nascuntur, ius quoque commune est; The law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth. Aug. in Epist. ad Hil. 89. & in Euang. Ioh. tract. 49. Vlp. de Iustitia & Iure. l.1: tit.1.

But

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall prouidence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in Men, inlightning our formall reason; so is it more then sense in Beasts; and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flie from the enemies of their liues: seeing that Bulles and Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogges; and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other, yea, though by them neuer seene before, and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to prouide for Winter, Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twigges which hang ouer Riuers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere: to saue their egges and young ones from the Monkies, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twigge will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not beare any fruite except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that Law, which the infinite and vnsearchable wisedome of God had in all eternity prouided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassall to passions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and custome hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaide, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which Saint Augustine calleth the Law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the Lawes of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to vse one anothers Wife, and to the Woman to choose them others besides their Husbands, to beget them with childe: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

Supra §. 4. ex loco ad Rom. 7. 23.

Theod. l. 5. de curādis affect: Gracorum.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloued wiues: as also they haue many other customes remembred by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

Acosta.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Lawes some men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to prouide for our selues by another mans destruction: that iniury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall Lawes, either out of Saint Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of diuine light; the other, the dictate or sentence of practique reason) the same can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, than to the exercise of Iustice and vprightnesse: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which wee would be content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the Law of nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to Dauid sheweth vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which leade vs thereby to our last end; which is eternall life: though of themselues not sufficient without faith and grace.

Nemo iure naturæ cum alterius detrimento locupletior fieri debet.

Psal. 4.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaide, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the Law increated and eternall. For without any Law written, the right reason and vnderstanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which haue not the Law, doe by nature those things contained in the Law: they hauing not the Law, are a Law vnto themselues. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the same right vnto all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation; In arce altissimæ rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which shew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for a witnesse of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

Rom. 2. 14.

Rom. 2. 15.

And it is moſt true, that whoſoeuer is not a law vnto himſelfe (while hee hopeth to abuſe the world by the aduantage of hypocriſie) worketh nothing elſe, but the betraying of his owne ſoule, by crafty vnrighteouſneſſe, purchaſing eternall perdition. For it helpeth vs not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, ſeeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: ſome Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arefcit; Thoſe flowers wither while we diſcourſe of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we ſhould therefore inhabite and dwell within our ſelues, and become fearefull witneſſes of our ſecreteſt euils, did that reuerend Philoſopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maximè omnium verere teipſum; Commit nothing foule or diſhoneſt, ſaith he, neither to be knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but aboue all men reuerence thine owne conſcience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reaſon: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to thoſe operations, which are anſwerable to their owne forme; as fire to giue heate. Now, as the reaſonable minde is the forme of man, ſo is he aptly moued to thoſe things which his proper forme preſenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reaſon offereth; and the acts of right reaſon, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reaſon, is man leaſt excuſable: as being a reaſonable creature. For all elſe, both ſenſitiue, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God impoſed on them at their firſt creation.

Gen. 1. The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the hearbe which ſeedeth ſeede, &c. and the Beaſt, which liueth thereon. He gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: Iob. c. 28. which they obey. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He cauſed the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to ſerue for ſignes and for ſeaſons. Were theſe as rebellious as man, for whoſe ſake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes; the whole world would then periſh, and all returne to the firſt Chaos, darkeneſſe, and confuſion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reaſon, did Caine perceiue his owne wickedneſſe, and offence, in the murther of Abel: for he not onely feared the diſpleaſure of God, but the reuenge of men: it being written in his reaſon, that whatſoeuer he performed towards others, the ſame by others might be done vnto him againe. And that this iudgement of well and euill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall Law, before the Law written: Moſes in the perſon of God witneſſeth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well, ſhalt thou not be accepted, and if thou doe not well, ſinne lyeth at thy doore.

The Schoolemen are large alſo in this queſtion of the naturall Law: the ſame being opened amply by Reinerius, Antoninus, and Valentia. But it is not my purpoſe to write a Volume of this ſubiect.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reaſon taken properly, and not a habite, as it is an euident naturall iudgement of practique reaſon: they diuide into indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration (as that good is to be followed, and euill eſchewed) and demonſtrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuerſall propoſitions. Againe, as it anſwereth the naturall appetite, preſcribing things to be deſired as good, or to be auoyded as euill (as of the firſt, to deſire to liue, and to ſatisfie hunger, &c. and of the ſecond, to eſchew paines, ſorrow, and death) in this conſideration Tho. 9. 94. art. 2. they diuide it, according to the diuers kinds of appetites that art in vs. For in euery man there are three ſorts of appetites, which anſwer the three degrees of naturall Law. The firſt is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the deſire, both to liue, and to preſerue our being and life, alſo the deſire of iſſue, with care to prouide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the deſire of life comprehends the deſire of children. And to theſe appetites are referred the firſt indemonſtrable lawes of nature, for the moſt part. For it needs no proofe, that all creatures ſhould deſire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their iſſue, when they cannot in themſelues. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: ſo he doth deſire good, and ſhun euill. For it is common to all things, to deſire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to deſire their owne Ethic. l. 1. c. 1. good. And ſo is Good defined by Ariſtotle, to be that which all deſire. Which definition Baſil vpon the 44. Pſalme approueth: Rectè quidem Bonum definierunt, Quod omnia expetunt; Rightly haue ſome men defined Good, or Goodneſſe, to be that which all things deſire.

The ſecond kinde of appetite is of thoſe things which appertaine to vs, as wee haue ſenſe. Whence, by the law of Nature, we deſire the delights of euery ſenſe; but with ſuch moderation, as may neither glut vs with ſatiety, nor hurt vs with exceſſe. For as Senſe it ſelfe is for the preſeruation of life and being: ſo is it meete, euen by the Law of nature, that the ſenſitiue appetite ſhould not carry vs to the deſtruction, either of our life or being. And although (ſeeing both theſe kinds of appetites are in beaſts) we may well ſay, that Nature hath giuen diuers Lawes vnto them: In which ſenſe the Ciuilians define Naturall right, or Ius naturale, to be the ſame which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Yet the Schoolemen admit not, that the inſtincts of beaſts can be properly called a Law, but onely a Ius, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of euery Law. For ſo they diſtinguiſh it; where Vlpian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (ſaith Valentia) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Vlpian alſo diſtinguiſheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Ius naturæ, the other Ius gentium: the Diuines vnderſtand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reaſon: both in beaſts and men; and reſtraine the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of thoſe things which appertaine properly to man, as he is a liuing creature reaſonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our ſelues: and the Lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuiſions of this law of nature anſwering the diuiſion of matter, which it preſcribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: firſt, becauſe it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or motiue faculty, which is but one, ſtirring vp to good, and declining the contrary: ſecondly, becauſe all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill auoyded: and thirdly, becauſe all the parts are reduced to one and the ſame laſt ende.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifeſt: and chiefly man; becauſe he is indued with reaſon; in whom as reaſon groweth, ſo this band of obſeruing the law of nature increaſeth, Poſtquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod ſcriptum eſt, Aduenientemandato, peccatum reuixit; When reaſon grew to perfection, then it came to paſſe, which was written by Saint Paul, When the Commandement came, ſinne reuiued. Neither is it a ſmall warrant for this law of nature, when thoſe which breake the ſame, are ſaid by Saint Paul, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate ſenſe (or minde) to doe thoſe things which are not conuenient: and againe, that their conſciences beare witneſſe, and their thoughts accuſe them. For, though this law of nature ſtretch not to euery particular: as to command faſting and the like: yet, it commandeth in generall all good, and whatſoeuer is agreeable to right and reaſon. And therefore, ſaide Damaſcene; Homines facti ſunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam eſt; Men (ſaith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrary to nature: and Saint Auguſtine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam eſt; Euery vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary vnto it.

Baſil. Rom. 1. 18. Rom. 2. 15. L. 2. Tid. ortho. c. 30.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature ſo ſtreight, but that they ſuffer exceptions in ſome particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to vnequall merit: by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men ſhall enioy the fruites of their labours to themſelues: according to the rules of iuſtice and equitie.

And though the Law of nature command, that all things be reſtored which are left in truſt, yet in ſome cauſes, this her law ſhee ſuffereth to be broken: as to denie a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was ſober. But the vniuerſall principles can no more be changed, then the decrees of God are alterable: who according to Saint Paul, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himſelfe. 2 Tim. 2.

§. VII. Of the written Law of GOD.

AFter the eternall, and naturall, the law Positiue or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kindes: Diuine and Humane. Againe, the diuine positiue law is double; the Olde and New: The Old was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stoode 2513. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere, when as Ascatades or Ascades gouerned the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argiues, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeeres. And this it seemes, was the first written law which the world receyued. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Græcians: no not in Homers time, who liued after the fal of Troy 80. years at least: and Troy it selfe was cast down 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his expresst wil in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the comming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei lib. 1.

The reason knowne to vs why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of Families might easily without any written Law, instruct their owne Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kindes of good, and euill; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authority than other to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolemen, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the cheefest.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of Dauid, The law of the Lord is vndefiled, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisedome to children. For the humane Law, saith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by Dauid it is called vndefiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the Lawes of men can onely take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that wee be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by Dauid: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nullæ essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceiued in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of trueth, which by reason of diuersitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, wee cannot be assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without errour: and therefore also sayde Dauid, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giuing Wisedome to children.

§. VIII. Of the vnwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarkes by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, betweene the creation and the written Law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarkes of the first Age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoeuer was first imposed by Adam, the same was obserued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Iacob, Ioseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered ouer by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Iewes afterward called called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Iewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserued in the bosoms of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the diuine law reuealed to the Patriarks, and from them deliuered to the posterity, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that hee should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gaue other names significant, not onely to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruites, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was mariage first instituted: all men thence-after being commanded to cohabit with their Wiues, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murther and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankinde by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noa, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them * from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished; could not be vnknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and iustice interposing between the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandement God repeated to Noa, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Whoso sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a seruant of seruants shall he be vnto his brethren. Againe, we find that the vnnaturall sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Rauishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the iudgement which Iuda gaue against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh & Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife: To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise vp seede to his brother that left a widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be saide, not onely to haue bene written in the hearts of men, before it was engrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene giuen in precept to the Patriarks. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: so euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten law; the Angels intuitiuely; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

* The common reading is cum terra: but God did not destroy the earth, & why may not this præposition in this place, haue the same force, which it hath according to Iunius, Gen. 4. 1 Item 44. 4. & Deut. 34. 1. especially, seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is saide verse 7. Delebo hominem de superficie terræ. Gen. 9. 6. Gen. 9. 25. Gen. 34. 25. Gen. 38. 24.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restraine: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know whatsoeuer the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law. Rom. 3. 19.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets and Psalmes, it is there taken for the fiue Bookes of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must bee fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes. Luc. 24. 44.

When it is opposed to the Gospell, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, Rom. 3. 28. and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum ius: as, For ye are not vnder
Rom. 6, 4. Gal. 5, 18. the Law, but vnder Grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but sha-Iohn 1, 17. dowes and figures; as, The Law was giuen by Moses, but grace & truth came by Iesus Christ.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs comming, it signifieth the whole poli-Gal. 3, 23. Luc. 16, 6. cy of the Iewes Common-weale; as, Before faith came, we were kept vnder the Law, &c. Or the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and
Heb. 7, 12. & 10, 1. the Law, or the Priests, prophesied vnto Iohn. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Autho-Rom. 8, 2. Rom. 7, 23. rity, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

But the written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatning death to those which breake the law in the least. For, according to S. Iames, Iames 2, 10. Whosoeuer shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition vsed by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old and New law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus præscribens modum necessarium vt aptè peruenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est vltimus humanæ vitæ finis; The diuine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessary meane, whereby they may aptly attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that euill to be auoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to bee done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord, whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Againe, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holinesse; (for externall worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudicial teacheth the particular gouernment, fit for the Common-wealth of the Iewes, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equity. And therefore was it saide of Saint Paul, The
Rom. 7, 12. commandement is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the gouernment of the Common-wealth of the Iewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifices, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passeouer, and such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, annointings, and attire, as not to weare mixt Garments of Linnen and Wollen: as also it prohibiteth other vnnaturall and vnproper commixtions, as Thou shalt not yoake together in a Plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seede in one field. It also exhorteth naturall compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty euen to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some referre these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beate downe the first buds of the tree, nor muzzell the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the comming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: sauing in the ability of iustifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worship God: and to vse charitie one towards another: which for euer ſhall be required at our hands. Therein alſo are we in particular directed, how this ought to bee done: which power of directing by ſpeciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth ſtill. For theſe things alſo are commanded in both Teſtaments to be obſerued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, & for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall alſo liueth in the things which it fore-ſignified. For the ſhadow is not deſtroyed, but perfected, when the body it ſelfe is repreſented to vs. Beſides, it ſtil liueth, in that it giueth both inſtruction and teſtimony of Chriſt, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for ſome Ceremonies and Types of holy ſignification, which are ſtil expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Chriſts comming, and in a farre leſſe degree of neceſſity.

Laſtly, the Iudiciall liueth in ſubſtance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuerſall equity thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of iuſtification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vſe and externall obſeruation (becauſe Chriſt himſelfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were ſignes and ſhadowes) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Iewes Common-weale and policie.

§. X. A propoſall of nine other points to be conſidered, with a touch of the fiue firſt.

AS for that which remaineth in the generall conſideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into theſe nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Maieſty of the Law-giuer.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniency of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacie and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old & new Teſtament.
7. The end and vſe of the Law.
8. The ſenſe and vnderſtanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is ſufficiently proued by S. Paul, in theſe words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandement is holy, and iuſt, and good: which three attributes are referred, as afore ſaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maieſty of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, ſo he onely gaue the Law, who could onely giue the end & reward promiſed, to wit, the ſaluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moſes immediately, but by the miniſtery of Angels: as it is ſaid. And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels. Galath 3, 19

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiuing this Law, is in three reſpects. Firſt, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and diſſeuered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promiſe made to Abraham. Prepared they were, becauſe they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and ſeuered they were, becauſe of Gods choice and election. Children of the promiſe they were, for the promiſe was made by God vnto Abraham and his ſeede: not vnto his ſeeds, as to Eſau and Iacob, but to his ſeede, as to Iacob or Iſrael ſingularly, of whom Chriſt. Now to Abraham and his ſeede were the promiſes made: hee ſayth not to the ſeeds, as ſpeaking of many, but to thy ſeede, as of one, which is Chriſt. Gal. 3, 16

4. The conueniency of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Auguſtine: that it was about the middle time, betweene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moſes: the Law written in the Commandements receiued by Moſes in the worlds yeere 2514. continued to the Baptiſme of Iohn: from which time, begun the Law of Grace, which ſhall continue to the worlds end. Other reaſons for the conueniency are formerly giuen.

5. The fift conſideration is of the efficacie of this Law, the ſame being a diſpoſition to, or or signe of our Iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiuen, who taketh away the sinnes of the world: and therefore Gal. 4. S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weake; beggerly as containing no

Heb. 9. grace, weake as not able to forgiue and iustifie. The bloud of Goats and Bulles, and the ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christs blood, Gal. 2. which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

§. XI. Of the sixt point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

THe Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way proposed for attaining to saluation: as the Olde by workes, the New by grace: but in the thing it selfe, or obiect and remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse and saluation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the New of more excellencie, in that it doeth more liuely expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testa-
Heb. 8, 13. ment, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliuered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the New was giuen in a promise of an euerlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for euer during.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and cheefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and cheefe part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters therof: The word Euangelion, signifying a ioyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer vsed it) the reward giuen to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tydings in generall, as in Esay the 52. verse 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most ioyfull message of saluation, as in Luc. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Acts. 1. Christ: and so we vnderstand the foure Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9, 14. & 2 Cor. 8, 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Danaus comprised in these foure.

In their Author.
In the substance of the Couenant, or things promised.
In the foundation, to wit, Christ.
In the effects, that is, in righteousnesse and iustification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one Couenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the olde proposing him as to come, the new as alreadie come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: euen the saluation of our soules: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by obseruing the Law, an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heauenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselues strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heauenly Hierusalem: according to this
Cap. 11. v. 13. place of the Hebrewes: All these dyed in faith, and receiued not the promises, but saw them farre off, and beleeued them; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrimes on the earth. To Lib. de Ciuit. Dei. 18. c. 15. which purpose also Saint Augustine: Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes tendentes per promiſſa terrena aterna promitti: Few (ſaith he) do vnderſtand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promiſed. And S. Hierome: Noluit Deus paſcere Iudæos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibuſque, vt Iudæi ſomniant; God would not feed the Iewes as beaſts with corporall gifts and riches, as themſelues dreame. And this may bee gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego ſum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the preſent, or for periſhable things, that God gaue them this promiſe, but in reſpect of the future: to wit, the ſafety of their ſoules. For as God created both body and ſoule, ſo hath he of his goodneſſe, not left the better part vncared for, which liueth euer. In Sophon. cap. 3. v. 9.

The agreement betweene the Old and New Teſtament in ſubſtance, inferres alſo the agreement in foundation. For Chriſt is called the foundation of the law, laide both by the Apoſtles and Prophets; in whom all the promiſes of God in the Olde and New, are aſſured: the Fathers hauing eaten the ſame ſpirituall foode, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our ſinne and miſerie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, ſerueth in ſubordination to the Goſpel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and ſaluation: to which the Law ſeruing as an introduction (for to thoſe which acknowledge their ſin and miſery, God ſheweth his mercy and ſaluation) may be ſaid to agree with the Goſpel in the effect. For otherwiſe if we ſeuer the Law from ſubordination to the Goſpel, the effects are very different: the one ſheweth the way of righteouſneſſe by workes, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Goſpel healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Goſpel allureth; Moſes accuſeth, Chriſt defendeth: Moſes condemneth, Chriſt pardoneth. The Old reſtraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data eſt lex quæ non ſanaret (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) ſed qua ægrotantes probaret; The Law was giuen, not to helpe, but to diſcouer ſickneſſe: and Saint Chryſoſtome, Data eſt lex, vt ſe homo inueniret, non vt moribus ſanaretur, ſed vt medicus quæreretur; The Law was giuen that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his diſeaſe was therby holpen, but that he might then ſeeke out the Phyſitian. For Chriſt came to ſaue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moſes was but a ſeruant, and Chriſt a Son; ſo the greateſt benefit was reſerued to bee brought, as by the worthieſt perſon, ſaith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope. Hom. 1. ad Rom. Heb. 7.

§. XII. Of the reſt of the points propoſed.

THe ſeuenth conſideration is of the end, and vſe of the law: which is to bring vs to Chriſt: for finding no righteouſneſſe in our owne workes, wee muſt ſeeke it in ſome other. But this is the laſt, and remote, and vtmoſt end: the next and proper end of the law, is to preſcribe righteouſneſſe, and to exact abſolute and perfect obedience to God. Curſed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law. Leuit. 18, 5.

The ſecond end of the Law, is to render vs inexcuſable before God: who knowing ſo perfect a law, do not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteouſneſſe, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and cheefe end of the law, is as hath beene ſaid, to ſend vs to Chriſt, and his grace, being in our ſelues condemned and loſt. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a moſt violent and fearfull tempeſt, threatning eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to deſigne, and preſerue, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Diſcipline, and awe, till the comming of Chriſt: after whom the Church was to be diſperſed ouer the whole world.

Theſe be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vſe of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Chriſt, and the new Teſtament. The vſe of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equity, and right, whereto we muſt conforme our ſelues.

The ſence and vnderſtanding of the Law is double, literall and ſpirituall: by the literall we are taught the worſhip and ſeruice of God: by the ſpirituall, the figures and myſticall fore-ſpeakings of Chriſt.

Laſtly, for the durance or continuance of the* Law, the ſame had being vntil the paſſion of Chriſt: before which time, and while Chriſt taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true ſacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the Croſſe,

*Gen. 49, 10. The Scepter ſhall not depart from Iuda, nor a Lawgiuer from betweene his feet, vntil Shilo come.

Crosse, then the Iewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadowes) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token wherof, the vaile of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailes and shadowes were now to be remoued, not that the morall law of the Commandements was hereby abolished, or weakned at all: othervvise then that it had not povver to condemn according to the Iewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe seuerely commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And heerein Dauid so much reioyced, as he preferred the obseruation of the Law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus diuitijs; I haue been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And againe, The law of thy mouth is good for me aboue thousands of gold and siluer. This is the loue of God (saith S. Iohn) that we keepe his Commandement. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commaundement (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heauen that thou shouldst say, Who shall go vp for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cause vs to heare it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go ouer the Sea for vs, and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very neere vnto thee, euen in thy mouth, & in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I haue set before thee this day, life and death, good and euill, in that I command thee this day, to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his waies, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou mayst liue, &c. Neither is it saide in vaine in Saint Mathew. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serua mandata; If thou wilt enter into life keepe the Commandements: and in S. Iohn; Scio quia mandatum eius vita aeterna est; I know that his Commandement is life euerlasting. And if this bee the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keep his Commandements: certainly hee is but a lyar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mans ability, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if wee rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandements, we shall finde in our selues, how wee borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that wee are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of libertie) proposeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God, that we keepe his Commandements, & his Commandements are not greeuous, 1. Iohn 3. 12. and if wee examine euery precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences; it is not harde for any man to iudge, by what easie perswasions, we steale away from our owne power, as vnwilling to vse it against our pleasing desires.

Cap. 9. 17. Cap. 12, 50.

§. XIII. Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

FOr by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing euery reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity, that by this almighty Vnity, all things haue bin caused, and are continued. And if bruite beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his prouidence he hath also prouided for euery of them, Which giueth to beastes their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

Psal. 147, 9.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the deuill crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant soules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if hee be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more vilde prize and baser, then the baseſt of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Wisedome of Salomon) but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our iournies of him that cannot go, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which he prayeth, bee more senseleſse: Dauid maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them. Wisd. 13, v. 18. Psalme 35, 18.

The breach of the third Commandement, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greateſt inchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdaine of God, vnleſse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an aduantage. For as our corrupteſt nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euerlasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the deuill brought vp among men, without all subtlety of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greateſt and most scornfull aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most saluage Nations of the world do not vse it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the laborer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23, 12. And in the seuenth day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towardes them, who after God gaue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weake and helpleſse infancie, and bestowed on vs the harueſt and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not do the actes following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casuall, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly, whosoeuer cannot forbeare to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vse of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from Adultery. Now, if the preseruation of Virginity haue bene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to the graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbeare the dishonour and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beauty and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbeare the prosequution of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate til it turne to fire, and fire to flame. Nuptia replent terram, Virginitas Paradisum.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kinde of violent robbery had beene vsed in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise now a-dayes in England, and to the dishonor of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speak not of the poore and miserable soules, whom hunger and extreame necessity inforceth, but of those detested Theeues, who to maintaine themselues Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man; or breake by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkennesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impouerishing whole Families, and taking the bread and foode from the mouthes of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued; it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolue, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth theſe Hell-hounds. And if euery man preſume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but theſe men would in a ſhort time impouerish or deſtroy it.

The fifth Commandement of this ſecond Table, is, the prohibition of falſe witneſſe: from which if men could not forbeare, all ſurety of eſtate and life were taken away. And ſo much did God deteſt a falſe witneſſe, and a falſe accuſer, eſpecially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to ſuffer the ſame death or puniſhment, which he ſought by falſhood to lay on his brother.

The laſt of the ten Commandements forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wiues for concupiſcence, or their goodes for deſire of gaine. And this precept ſeemeth the hardeſt for men to obſerue; ſo eſteemed by reaſon of our fraile affections: and yet if wee iudge heereof rightly, it may bee doubted whether it extend to all our inconſiderate fancies and vaine thoughtes. For, although it be not eaſie to maſter all our ſudden paſſions, yet we may reſtraine and hinder the growing, and farther increaſe, if we pleaſe to intend our ſtrength, & ſeeke for grace. How the word Coueting reacheth to all thoſe it is to bee conſidered. For Concupiſcentia, according to ſome, Eſt effrænatus habendi appetitus; An vnbrideled, or vnreſtrained appetite of hauing: And as touching ſuch an appetite, we cannot excuſe our ſelues by any our naturall frailty, or vnaduiſed error; But as I ſuppoſe, the word Concupiſcence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbridled euill intent, or for ſome vrging inclination thereunto. All the queſtion is of the later ſort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id eſt, non deliberatus ratione, quæ eſt principium proprium actus boni aut vitioſi; Such paſſions, or inclinations are vnperfect acts, that is, not deliberated vpon by reaſon, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And ſure, it may ſeeme, that ſo long as we reſiſt ſuch motions, they harme vs not: as they ſay, Quamdiu refragamur nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no aſſent vnto them, it is thought by ſome that they hurt vs not; and that then onely they hurt, when we ſuffer them to beare ſway. But theſe men, as it ſeemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath bene forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandement, not onely the outward acte, but alſo the inward aſſent vnto euill, though it breake not out into acte, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandement and the reſt, the diſtinction of deſires is to be held: that ſome are with aſſent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without aſſent. For ſo euen the Morall Philoſopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill deſires, but without aſſent (for they are bridled by the ſtrength of right reaſon) as on the other ſide the Incontinent hath good deſires, but reſtrained and ſuppreſſed by contrary paſſions. The euill deſires when they are accompanied with aſſent, are in euery Commandement forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if we will haue any thing proper to this Commandement, wee muſt needs ſay, that the euill deſires of the Continent man (that is, euen thoſe which wee reſiſt and bridle) are heere forbidden. For though he that bridleth his euill deſires, bee much better than hee that yeeldeth vnto them: yet ſuch a man, euen according to the Heathen Philoſopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Ariſtotle himſelfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree vnto it: confeſsing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, ſeeing he ought not ſo much as to haue thē at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinity deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he ſaith, that in the Continent man the hauing of theſe euill deſires, thogh he reſiſt them, is the cauſe that he cannot be called a vertuous man: ſo we, that the hauing of them is a ſinne. Only in this we excell him heere: that we are able out of diuinity to giue the true reaſon of this doctrine: which is, that euery one ſinneth, that doeth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the euill deſires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, muſt needes be ſinne: ſeeing ſuch deſires, though bridled, are a-pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleaſed God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull endeuours to keepe his commandements, we witneſſe our loue toward himſelfe: we may not ſafely giue libertie to our vanities, by caſting backe vpon God (who is iuſtice it ſelf) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandements impoſſible for vs to keepe. For, as hee is accurſed (ſaith Saint Hierome) that auowes that the Law is in all things poſſible to be obſerued: ſo he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accursed is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselues, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the Law: so is our weakenesse also in the Scriptures laide before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be vnderstood, that we should without euasion, or without betraying of our selues, doe our faithfull endeuours to obserue them: which if we doe vnfainedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, Dauid witnesseth: Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, for in thy sight no flesh that liueth shall be iustified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And againe; Who can say, I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne greeuous without deliberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether hee giue way willingly, or restraine himselfe in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King giues to his subiect a commandement vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subiect neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Soueraigne with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

Psal. 143. 2. c. 8 v. 46. Prou. 20. v. 9.

§. XIIII.

If there were not any Religion nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be obserued.

AND if wee consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall Law, or ten Commandements, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull prouidence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them; were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if wee did not for our owne sakes striue to obserue these Lawes, all society of men, and all endeuours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and euery State and common-weale in the World fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that euery man might enioy the fruites of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, we might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaues; of ciuill men, and not of sauages. And hereof making our humane reason onely Iudge, let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and bloud-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit man-kinde to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, mettall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibility to receiue thence-from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth there-with this disaduantage, and ill to man, that whosoeuer taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murther were not forbidden, and seuerely punished, the race of mankinde would be extinguished: and whosoeuer would take the liberty to destroy others, giueth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe; This is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeuour by vertue and vndertaking to raise Families: murthers and poysonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthy and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all man-kinde would shortly after perish, or liue as the ſaluages, by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enioy the fruites thereof. And ſuch is the miſcheefe of robbery, as where Moſes for leſſer crimes appointed reſtitution fourefold, policie of State and neceſſity hath made it death.

To permit falſe witneſſes, is to take all mens liues and eſtates from them by corruption: the wicked would ſweare againſt the vertuous: the waſter againſt the wealthie: the idle begger and loyterer, againſt the carefull and painfull laborer: all triall of right were taken away, and iuſtice thereby baniſhed out of the world.

The coueting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a diſtraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we couet what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therin fed with vaine and fruitleſſe hopes, ſo long as we do but couet; and if we do attaine to the deſire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wiues or goods of our neighbours; we can look for no other, but that our ſelues ſhall alſo, either by theft or by ſtrong hand, be depriued of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there bee nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing? Surely, for our owne good, and not in reſpect of himſelfe, did the moſt mercifull & prouident God ordaine them; without the obſeruation of which, the vertues of heauenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the bleſſings giuen vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vnprofitable, and of no vſe. For wee ſhould remaine but in the ſtate of brute beaſts, if not in a farre more vnhappy condition.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written and vnwritten.

HVmane Law, of which now it followeth to ſpeake, is firſt diuided into two, (Viz.) Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten conſiſts of vſage, approued by time: which Iſidore cals Mores: and he defines Mores: to be Conſuetudines vetuſtate probatæ; to bee cuſtomes approued by antiquity, or vnwritten lawes. Now cuſtome differeth from vſe, as the cauſe from the effect: in that cuſtome is by vſe and continuance eſtabliſhed into a Law: but yet there where the law is defectiue, ſaith Iſidore.

And of cuſtomes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars; the firſt are written cuſtomes, receiued and exerciſed by Nations, as the cuſtoms of Burgundie and Normandie: the ancient generall cuſtome of England, & the cuſtomes of Caſtill, and other Prouinces.

The ſecond are theſe petty cuſtomes, vſed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall cuſtoms are ſome written, others vnwritten.

The particular or petty cuſtomes are ſeldome written, but witneſſed by teſtimonie of the inhabitants. The cuſtomes of the Duchie of Cornwall comprehending alſo the Stannerie of Deuon, as touching Tin, and Tin cauſes, are written in Deuon, but not in Cornwall. But howſoeuer vſe and time hath made theſe cuſtomes as lawes, yet ought euery cuſtome to be rationabilis, as well as præſcripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de iure ab initio non ſubſiſtit; That which at firſt was not grounded vpon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (ſaith Vlpian) quod ab initio vitioſum eſt, non poteſt tractu temporis conualeſcere; Courſe of time amends not that which was naught from the firſt beginning. For theſe two defences are neceſſary in all lawes of cuſtome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cauſe and reaſon be ſtrong, prouing a right birth, and neceſſary continuance: it being manifeſt, that euery cuſtome which is againſt the law, had his beginning from euill deeds, & therefore not without the former conſiderations to be allowed. And it is true, that all cuſtomes of this nature were but tollerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they haue beene ſince continued, becauſe poſterity is not bound to examine by what cauſe their Anceſtors were thereto moued. For non ſufficit ſimplex toleratio. And it is in this ſort ouer-ruled in the law; Per populum conſuetudo contra legem induci non poteſt, niſi de voluntate illius qui nouam legem, & nouam conſtitutionem ſtatuere poteſt, qui ſolus Princeps eſt; The people cannot bring in a new cuſtome againſt law: ſaue by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

In Reg. Iuris. 6. 2. q. 117. art. 1.

Vlp. l. 29.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by ſome defined to be the decree or doome of practique reaſon: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian cals the Law a common precept, the aduiſement of wiſemen, & the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calles the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Gouernment and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law natural, and eternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publike authority: prescribing necessary obseruances to the subiect. That euery Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Mihi lex esse non videtur, quæ iusta non fuerit; It seemes to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no Law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab æterna lege sibi homines deriuauerint.

Greg. de Val. ex Tho. q. 91. art. 3. & q. 94. art. 2.

L. 1. de lib. arb. cap. 6.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to bee made by an authorised Magistracie, it cannot bee doubted, be the gouernment of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniquæ constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so euery particular of the humane Law may be resolued into some principle or rule of the naturall.

4. Parts.

Tho. q. 3. 5. art. 2.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Iulia de Adulteriis, alia Cornelia de Sicariis; The Law of Iulian against Adultery is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the Law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for euery Law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Vlpian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadours be granted betweene enemies, &c. which Nationall Law, according to diuers acceptions, and diuers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Ius Ciuile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers estates it is also diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof Vlpian, Ius ciuile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei seruit: itaq; cum aliquid addimus vel detrahimus Iuri communi, Ius proprium, id est, Ciuile efficimus; The Ciuill Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

In Leg. 6. 2. a. ff. de Iustitia Iure.

The Law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as wel out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Romane customes and Lawes Regall. The Regal Lawes were deuised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiæ, or Papyrianæ, because they were gathered by Papyrius, Tarquin then reigning. For though so many of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished, Dion. Hal. shed, with the name; yet those of Seruius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common vtility, were continued, and were a part of the Lawes of the twelue Tables. To these Lawes of the twelue Tables were added (as the times gaue occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebi-scita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annuall Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathethed and interpreted by Iulian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall Lawes; and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Collections of Iustinian afterward were.

C. Sigon. l. 1. out of Pomponius.

The difference anciently betweene Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that Lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soueraigne authority (be the soueraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Iussum Magistratus, vnlesse by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most vnto an Edict, say that it is a Law for one yeere: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatiues; as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaime.

Lastly, the Humane Law is diuided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquility of the Common-weale: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Gouernment of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealth, or Church, Illud naturæ legem, hoc diuinam spectat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may Ius Ciuile be taken two wayes; first, as distinguished from the Law of Nations, as in the first diuision: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diuers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this diuision of the Schoolemen is obscure. For although the Ciuill be the same with the Secular, as the Ciuill is a Law, yet the Secular is more generall, and comprehendeth both the Ciuill, and all other Lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular Lawes, in vse among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-weales, there are three kindes; the Ciuill which hath euery where a voyce; and is in all Christian Estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Prouinciall. In Spaine besides the Law Ciuill, they haue the customes of Castill, and other Prouinces. In France besides the Ciuill, the customes of Burgundy, Bloys, Berri, Niuernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situes & assis en Lodunois, seront gouernez selon les coustumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be gouerned according to the customes of that place. There are also in France the customes of Normandy, and these of two kindes; Generall, and Locall; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and since their reformation haue these words; Nos autem, registrum prædictum, vsus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & authoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register aforesaide, laudable vse, and ancient customes we praise, approue, and by our Kingly authority confirme. The common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certaine Maximes by those customes of the Realme approoued. Vpon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

Art. 7 tit. 5. G. Cust.

These ancient customes of England haue beene approoued by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England, that the eldest sonne should inherite without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all Landes (that haue not beene resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enioy the Inheritance during his owne life: and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of Land haue foure sonnes, and the eldest of those foure haue also a Sonne, the three Brothers of the eldest Sonne, shall after the death of their Brother, enioy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-childe: the custome being grounded grounded vpon the reaſon of neceſſity. For the Iriſh in former times, hauing alwayes liued in a ſubdiuided Ciuill Warre, not onely the greateſt againſt the greateſt, but euery Baron and Gentleman one againſt another, were enforſt to leaue ſucceſſors of age and ability, to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Prouinces of France, there are certaine peculiar and petty Cuſtomes, beſides the great and generall cuſtome of the Land, ſo are there in England, and in euery part thereof. But the greateſt buſke of our Lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approued by the three eſtates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, becauſe they are Actes of choiſe, and ſelfe-deſire. Leges nulla alia cauſa nos tenent quàm quòd iudicio populi receptæ ſunt; The lawes do therefore binde the ſubiect, becauſe they are receiued by the iudgement of the ſubiect. Tum demum humanæ leges habent vim ſuam, cum fuerint non modò inſtitutæ, ſed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane lawes haue their ſtrength, when they ſhall not onely be deuiſed, but by the approbation of the people confirmed. Vlp. ff. de Leg. Leg. 32. Aug. de vera relig. cap 31 Gratian. in dec diſt. 4. Cum in ipſo.

Iſidore faſteneth theſe properties to euery Chriſtian Law, that the ſame bee honeſt, that it bee poſſible, that it bee according to Nature, and according to the cuſtome of the Countrey; alſo for the time and place conuenient, profitable, and manifeſt, and without reſpect of priuate profite, that it be written for the generall good. He alſo giues foure effects of the Law, which Modeſtinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and inſtigation: the former bindes vs by feare, to auoide vice; the latter incorageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportet eſſe vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum; It behoueth the Law to bee a mender of vices, and a commender of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obſeruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes: and it is two-fold; the one conſtraineth vs by feare of our conſciences, the other by feare of externall puniſhment. Theſe two effects the law performeth, by the exerciſe of thoſe two powers, to wit, Coactiue and Directiue.

The ſecond of theſe two effects remembred by Modeſtinus, is Inſtigation, or incorage-ment to vertue, as Ariſtotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being ſuch as they ought to be, doe both by preſcribing and forbidding, ſvrge vs to well-doing; laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchaſed. And this power affirmatiue commanding good, and power negatiue forbidding euil, are thoſe into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which Dauid comprehendeth the whole body and ſubſtance thereof: ſaying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum: Decline from euill, and do good. Pſalme 37.

§. XVI. That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what ſort.

NOW whether the power of the humane Law bee without exception of any perſon, it is doubtfully diſputed among thoſe that haue written of this ſubiect, as well Diuines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes bee compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforeſaide; the one Directiue, the other Coactiue: to the power Directiue they ought to bee ſubiect, but not to that which conſtraineth. For as touching violence or puniſhments, no man is bound to giue a preiudiciall iudgement againſt himſelfe; and if equals haue not any power ouer each other, much leſſe haue inferiours ouer their ſuperiours, from whom they receiue their authority and ſtrength.

And ſpeaking of the ſupreme power of lawes, ſimply then is the Prince ſo much aboue the lawes, as the ſoule and body vnited, is aboue a dead and ſenſeleſſe carkaſſe. For the King is truly called, Ius viuum, & lex animata: An animate and liuing law. But this is true, that by giuing authority to lawes, Princes both adde greatnes to themſelues, & conſerue it; and therefore was it ſaid of Bracton out of Iuſtinian; Meritò debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: namlex facit vt ipſe ſit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law firſt attributeth to the King; for it is the law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Bracton aſcribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein miſtaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes diuine; and by humane lawes onely, declared to bee Kings. As for the places remembred by the Diuines and Lawyers, which inferre Bract. l. 3.

a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, then the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God onely.

Psal. 50. Tibi soli peccaui, saith Dauid; Against thee onely haue I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be saide to be subiect to the Law; Princeps non subijcitur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernatiuæ: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humanæ non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humanæ non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane Law (say they) is but a kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that gouerneth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Gouernour himselfe, in whom the gouerning power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his owne power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himselfe: for euery actiue ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer o-

Greg. de Valentia de Leg. thers from the obligation of the Law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps siue legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges obseruare necessitate coactionis, Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subiects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politique Lawes, giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leaue it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, that wee ought not to seeme wiser then God himselfe, who hath told vs that there are no Lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be gouerned by. True it is, that all Nations haue their seuerall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to gouerne aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill Lawes did indeede containe in order a great part of the then knowne World, without any notable inconuenience, after such time as once it was receiued and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundry people, which it gouerned. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heauens; or peraduenture some temper of the soile and climate, affoording matter of prouocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and oportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Theeues) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo vnhappily diuerted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury reiected, because plurality of Wiues was denied vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously then seasonably. In such cases, me thinkes, it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniust; there may the Law, giuen by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the euill, which forceth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as vncouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparell in Turkie: there may a wise and vpright Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his Law required; euen as the good King Hezekia did, in a matter meerely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though hee be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted. 2 chron. cap. 30. v. 18, 19.

To this effect it is well obserued by Master Doctor Willet, that the morall Iudicials of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that wee are tyed to the same seuerity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiudged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the seuerity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heauy: for to shew more rigour then Moses, becommeth not the Gospell. Isa 9.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath beene the subiect of many learned discourses, neither wil I take vpon me, to speak any thing definitiuely in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthy Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwayes beene very plausible. And surely howsoeuer they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue beene witnesse, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a iudgement giuen against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proofe, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a yeere after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistris was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) greeuously lamented: but this Iudge, saith the same Authour, Sapius ipse mihi fassus est, quòd nunquam in vita sua animum eius de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himselfe often confessed vnto me, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of Sciences, which out of the sciences themselues cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subiect of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisedome. To which purpose well saith Saint Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit aternam, de qua nulli animæ iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if hee be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quàm posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation, then the Lord hath laide. Ca. 5. 3.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of Moses.

§. I. Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse; with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troupes.

WHen Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary; he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing seene what numbers of Men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age vpwards; he appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the wars, besides women & children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Ægypt; This great Army was diuided by Moses into foure grosse and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Iudah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Iudah were 74600. fighting men, led by Naason: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Iudah, who held the Vauntguard, and was the first that moued & marched, being lodged and quartered at their generall incamping on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Batttalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had ioyned vnto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simeon 59300. vnder Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. vnder Eliasaph: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were ioyned the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin; who, ioyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elishama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gamliel: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidam.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600. able men, marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were ioyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the Rereward, and moued last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. vnder Ahiezer: Asher 41500. vnder Pagiel: Nephtali 53400. vnder Ahira.

Besides these Princes of the seuerall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines ouer Thousands, ouer Hundreds, ouer Fifties, and ouer Tens; as it may appeare by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses; Num. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal Mutiners, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes, or Generall Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gaue to his children, tooke place not onely in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but euen in sorting them vnder their seuerall Standards in the wildernesse it was obserued. For Iudah had the precedency and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sonnes of Leah, Iacobs wife. Reuben hauing lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had vndergone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Ioseph, who in temporall blessings had the prerogatiue of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Iacobs prophecy) taking place before the elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best-beloued brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Iacobs Concubines, was giuen the leading of the fourth Army, according to Iacobs prophecy. He had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Lea, or Rachel, but onely the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, sur-rounded by the Leuites. Neere vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approch, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neere it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was cõmitted. So sacred was the moueable Temple of God, and with such reuerence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their seuerall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people obserued the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselues, as in an inner square, on euery side of the Tabernacle; the Gesshurites on the West, within the Armie, and Standard of Ephraim, ouer whom Eliasaph commanded, in number 7500.

The

The Family of Cohath on the South-side, guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and betweene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, ouer whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged ou the North-side, within the Army of Dan; On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Iudah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuiticall Families, was Eleazar the sonne of Aaron, his successour in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching; the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reuerend care, which Moses the Prophet, and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industry vsed in the framing thereof, and euery, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the prouisions; the dutifull obseruance in the laying vp, and preseruing the holy Vessels; the solemne remouing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the prouident defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptist, Brownist, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be serued and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: insomuch as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence again into the Fields and Mountaines, and vnder the hedges; and the Offices of the Ministery (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-gouernment, left to newnesse of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: euery contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Reuelation; insomuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no lesse variable then contrary to it selfe, the Faith of Men will soone after dye away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorne and contempt. Which distraction gaue a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Si me adiungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si me alijs adiungo, à vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adioyne my selfe to you, I am condemned by others; If I ioyne with others, I am condemned by you: What I should anoide I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II. The offerings of the twelue Princes: the Passeouer of the second yeere: The departing of Iethro.

NOw when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, prouided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbred his Army, and diuided them into the battailes and troupes before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelue Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, sixe couered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto: the Sanctuary excepted, which for reuerence was carried vpon the shoulders of the sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was conueyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were deliuered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the Sonnes of Gershon and Merari. Num. 6.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a Charger of fine siluer, weighing 130. sheckles; a siluer Boll of 70. sheckles; after the sheckle of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of gold, of ten sheckles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards halfe-pence sterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20. Gerahs; so a Sanctuary Sicle of siluer is about 7. groats, the common Sicle is but halfe as much, to wit ten Gerahs: as it is vsually expounded; though Villalpandus labours to proue that the common and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one, Num. 9. verse 5. Num. 10, 11. Exodus. Vt. 34. Numbers 9. 17.

their conquest, besides the Beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the Law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelue siluer Chargers, and twelue siluer Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. sheckles of siluer; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cuppes, to 120. sheckles of gold; which makes of sheckles of siluer 1200. euery sheckle of gold valuing ten of siluer, so that the whole of gold and siluer which they offered at this time, was about foure hundreth and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Passeouer, which they performed on the foureteenth day of the second moneth of the second yeere: and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloude was lifted vp from aboue the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this inuocation to God: Rise vp Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flie before thee. Then all the people of Israel remoued from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Paran; the Armie, or great squadron of Iuda, led by Naasson, taking the Vaunt-guard, followed by Nethaneel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched, as in the figure expreſt. And because the passage through so many deserts and mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leauing nothing vnforethought which might serue for the aduancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their iourney towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great vnderstanding & iudgement (as appeared by the Counsell hee gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges ouer the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Ægypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had liued 40. yeeres in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauell: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of soules, which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to vse many guides, and many conducters. To this request of Moses, it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18.27. and Num. 10.30. that Iethro, otherwise called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from Moses into his owne Countrey. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his returne to his owne Countrey, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leaue of his owne Countrey, by setting things in order, then to abide there.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

AFter this dismission of Hobab, Israel beganne to march towards the Deserts of Paran: and after three dayes wandring, they sate downe at the Sepulchers of lust, afterward called Tabeera, or Incensio: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiners and Murmurers which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth, of the second yeere, they rested and fed themselues with Quailes (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to cast vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iune: whereof surfaiting there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, answering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazeroth, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seuen dayes, after whose recouery Israel remooued toward the border of Idumæa; and incamped at Rithma, neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelue discouerers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themselues of the fertility and strength of the Countrey; as also to take knowledge of the Wayes, Passages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad king of the Canaanites surprized diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neere those wayes, through which the discouerers and searchers of the Land had formerlie past. Now, after the returne of the discouerers of Cades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliuerance from the the Ægyptian ſlauery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wildernesse (for ſo Moſes calleth it) with the victory which he gaue them againſt the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other then the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preſerued them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be ſlaughtered, and giuen for a prey and ſpoyle to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the ſearchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many ſtrong Towers and Caſtles; that many of the people were Gyant-like, (for they confeſt that they ſaw the ſonnes of Anac there) who were men of fearefull ſtature, and ſo farre ouer-topped the Iſraelites, as they appeared to them, and to themſelues, but as Graſhoppers in their reſpect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the reſt, wherein they both accuſed God, and conſulted to chooſe them a Captaine (or as they call it now adayes, an Electo) to carry them backe againe into Ægypt; ſo did God puniſh the ſame in a greater meaſure, than any of the former. For he extinguiſhed euery ſoule of the whole multitude (Joſua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promiſes, perſwaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine foote of Idumæa, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof; and aſſuring them of victory. But as men; whom the paſſion of feare had bereaued both of reaſon and common ſenſe, they threatned to ſtone theſe encouragers to death; accounting them as men either deſperate in themſelues, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God reſiſted theſe wicked purpoſes, and interpoſing the feare of his bright glory between the vnaduiſed fury of the multitude, and the innocency and conſtancy of his ſeruants, preſerued them thereby from their violence; threatning an intire deſtruction of the whole Nation, by ſending among them a conſuming and mercileſſe peſtilence. For this was the tenth inſurrection and rebellion, which they had made, ſince God deliuered them from the ſlauery of the Ægyptians. But Moſes (the mildeſt or meekeſt of all men) prayed vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this ſo ſeuere a iudgement, how deſeruedly ſoeuer inflicted, would increaſe the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occaſion to vaunt, that the God of Iſrael, failing in power to performe his promiſes, ſuffered them to periſh in theſe barren and fruitleſſe Deſarts. Yet as God is no leſſe iuſt than mercifull, as God is ſlow to anger, ſo is his wrath a conſuming fire; the ſame being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand leſſe heauy than hoped for, he ſcourged this iniquity, ſo by the meaſure of his glory (euermore iealous of neglect and deriſion) he ſuffered not the wicked to paſſe vnpuniſhed, reſeruing his compaſſion for the innocent: whom, becauſe they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleaſed to preſerue, and in them to performe his promiſes, which haue neuer beene fruſtrate.

§. III.

Of their vnwillingneſſe to returne: with the puniſhment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOW when Moſes had reuealed the purpoſes of God to the people, and made them know his heauy diſpleaſure towards them, they began to bewail themſelues, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing alſo their appointment. And then when God had left them to themſelues, and was no more among them, after they had ſo often plaid and dallied with his mercifull ſufferings, they wold needs amend their former diſobedience by a ſecond contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the aduice of Moſes; who aſſured them, that God was not among them; and that the Arke of his couenant ſhould not moue, but by His direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies ſword which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no leſſe ſharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no leſſe cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow thoſe counſels which carry them to their owne deſtructions: ſo the Hebrewes, after they had forſaken the opportunity by God and their Conducters offered; and might then haue entered Iudæa before their enemies were prepared and ioyned, did afterward, contrary to Gods commandement, vndertake the enterpriſe of themſelues; and ranne head-long and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumæa. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioyned, and attending their aduantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuite, consumed them all the way of their flight, euen vnto Hormah: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to preuent their displantation and destruction threatned. Of which powerfull assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioyned together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to returne by those painefull passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the bankes of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came back to passe ouer Iordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the 600. and odde thousand, which came out of Ægypt (Moses, Iosua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborne and carelesse generations were wholly worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of the discouerers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermaunded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sunne and Moone in after-times, it is proued out of sundry other places.

Amos 5. 25. Acts 7. 42. 2 Kin. 17. 16, & cap. 21, v. 3. & c. 23. v. 4, 5. 11. 2 chro. 33. 3. Hierem. c. 19. v. 13. &c.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commaundement receiued from God, departed towardes the South from whence he came, to recouer the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he remooued to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuided among them. From thence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah he croft the Valley, and sate downe at Ressa, neere the foote of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceelata; where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwayes keeping the Valley, betweene two great ledges of mountaines, (those which bound the Desert of Sinne, and those of Pharan) croft the same from Ceelata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence hee passed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thahah, and so to Thara or Thare, the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram; who for their contempt of God & his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp aliue, and by the Earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heauen; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest maruailes and iudgements of God, that hath beene shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly swallowed vp aliue into the Earth with their families and goods; euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church and Common-weale of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirme them, it pleaseth him in this place also to approoue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelue rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes; of which Moses receiued one of euery Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on euery rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons on that of Leui, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night, had on it both Buddes, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

Num. 33.

From Tharah the whole Army remoued to Methra; and thence to Esmona; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masurit, after Saint Hierome) and from Moseroth to Beneiacan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a Riuer, which falleth into the Red Sea, betweene Madian and Asiongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Aſiongaber, where Salomon furniſhed his Fleetes for the Eaſt India, there was ſtore of freſh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great Riuer in Arabia the ſtonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (ſaith he) the inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia releeued the Army of Cambyſes: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceiued, as many times hee is, in finding theſe Springs at Gadgad, or Ietabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Manſion. For it was at Punon, that thoſe Springs are ſpoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the ſeauenth Verſe, is alſo called Ietabata, or Iotbath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the Riuer Zared, the next adioyning. And that theſe Springes ſhould fall into the Red Sea, at Aſiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleeue, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of freſh water in thoſe ſandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their courſe for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thirſty ſand, before they can recouer the bankes of the Red Sea. Her: l. 3.

From Ietabata, Moſes directed his iourney towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrona, and from thence to Eſiongaber: which City in Ioſephus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieroms, Eſia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, hee turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded: Eſiongaber being the fartheſt place towards the South-East, that Moſes trauailed in that paſſage. Deut. 2.

It ſeemeth that Eſiongaber or Aſiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the poſſeſſion of the Kings of Edom. For it is ſaide, That the Lord ſpake vnto Moſes and Aaron in the Mount Hor; neere the Coaſt of the Land of Edom; ſo as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumæa. And if Eſiongaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this preſent beene ſubiect vnto the Idumæans. Moſes would alſo haue demanded a free paſſage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumæans obtained thoſe places: for it is ſaide; And they aroſe out of Madian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were thoſe companies that followed young Adad of Idumæa, into Ægypt, when he fled from Ioab. Likewiſe it is ſaide of Salomon, that hee made a Nauy of ſhippes in Eſiongaber beſides Eloth, in the Land of Edom. Num: 21. 20. v. 13. 1 Kings 11. 13

§. V.

Of Moſes arriuall at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

FRom Eſiongaber hee turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderneſſe of Zin, which is Kadeſh: or in Beroth, of the children of Iacan; where they ſate downe in the firſt Moneth of the fortieth yeere, after they left Ægypt. For at the next Manſion Aaron died in the firſt day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking ende at Eſiongaber. And at this City of Cades (for ſo it was thought to be) or neere it, died Miriam or Mary, Moſes ſiſter, whoſe Sepulcher was to be ſeene in Saint Hieromes time, as himſelfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured moſt violently againſt Moſes, by reaſon of the ſcarcity of water. For neither the puniſhments by fire from Heauen, by being deuoured and ſwallowed vp by the Earth, by the ſudden peſtilence, which often ſeized them, nor any miracle formerly ſhewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and ſatiſfied in euery of their appetites: but in ſtead of ſeeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they ſuffered hunger, thirſt, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed eſtates, and caſting vngratefully on Moſes all their miſaduentures; yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deſerts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miſeries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the ſight of the Land promiſed, they againe as obſtinately tempted God as in former times, and neither truſted his promiſes, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purpoſes of Num: 20. 1. Num: 20. 3.

Num. 20. 9. God are without beginning; so his mercies being without ende; he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselues and their cattell were satisfied. Neuertheless, because God perceiued a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to ende the trauailes of Aaron at the Mount-2553. taine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was despoyled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine; but GOD receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seene.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seauen and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esiongaber, incamped at Mosera, after hee departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Beniaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, Num. 33. where Miriam, Moses sister dyed; the first being the seauen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should haue beene written, Hor iuxta Mosera; Hor neere Mosera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as hee past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumea, praying him that he might passe with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neerest way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise taking his iourney by the Riuers of Zared, Arnon, and Iordan, hee might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Riuers, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumea hereunto, Moses remembred him, that hee was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the sonnes of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Esau his Ancester had made warre, and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Idumea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or waste his Countrey, but that hee would restraine his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoeuer he vsed, yea, euen for the water, which themselues or their Cattell should

Deut 2.4 drinke. For Moses was commanded by God, not to prouoke the children of Esau. But the King of Idumea knowing the strength of his owne Countrey, the same being neere Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountaines: and withall suspecting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Countrey, it would rest in their willes to giue him law, resoluedly refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the

Num. 20. 20. & 21. Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible meanes. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his Countrey together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses

Num. c. 20. considering, that the ende of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir or Idumea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of natural vnderstanding the greatest of any man, & the skilfullest man of warre that the world had, he refused to aduenture the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being ouercome, gaue but a passage to inuade others; and which by reason of the seate of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumæa, and trauelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leauing the way of Idumæa, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Deserts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanched the way of Idumæa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victory, had Moses beene enforst first to haue made his way by the Sword through Idumæa, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolued to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Ægypt, before they came neerer his owne home, leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set vpon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many heards of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was euermore subiect to surprise. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, hee slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which ioyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an ouerthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses, would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy, 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are saide to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory ouer Israel, neere Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessour that then preuailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea; and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be inuaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compasse Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites vtterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue beene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deserts of Zin and Moab, and haue fetcht a wearisome and needlesse compasse, by the Riuers of Zared and Arnon.

Num. 14. 45.

Neither is their coniecture to be valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabite any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territory lay without it, and neere the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Num. 33. 40.

Againe, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Iudæa. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had past Iordan: Iosua then gouerning them; who in the twelfth Chapter and foureteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his Citie ſo called; and with him the King of Herma: to which place the Iſraelites purſued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongſt thoſe Kings, which he vanquiſhed, and put to death.

Now after this aſſault and ſurprize by Arad, Moſes finding that all entrance on that ſide was defended, he led the people Eaſtward to compaſſe Idumæa and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites. But the Iſraelites, to whom the very name of a Deſert was terrible, began againe to rebell againſt their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whoſe venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement ſet vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moſes leauing the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea, and Cœloſyria, encamped at Zalmona: and thence he remoued to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making theſe iourneys by the edge of Idumæa, but without it. For Phunon was ſometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verſe 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieued the people, it was not thereby meant that the Iſraelites turned backe towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonſeca) per viam qua habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that ſided the Red Sea, but in deede they croſt, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Eſiongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, ſo Iſrael to ſhunne the border of Edom, and to take the vtmoſt Eaſt part of Moab, croſt the common way towards the Eaſt, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adioyning to the Land of Suph, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Manſion, that is, where the Mountaines ſo called take beginning, and are as yet but ſmall Mountures of Hilles, on the Eaſt border of Moab; From thence they recouered Dibon Gad, or the Riuer of Zared, which riſeth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And hauing paſt that Riuer, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verſe 22. calleth the Houſe of Diblathaim, the ſame which afterward was deſtroyed among the reſt by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the Riuer of Arnon, and encamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moſes doth not remember Helmondiblathaim, but ſpeaketh of his remoue from the Riuer of Zared, immediately to the other ſide of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, betweene them and the Amorites: ſpeaking, as he found the ſtate of the Countrey at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predeceſſour of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblathaim, Moſes ſent meſſengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to deſire a paſſage through his Countrey: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he deſired to giue a reaſon to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he vndertooke. And though Edom had refuſed him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moſes alſo in ſending meſſengers to Sehon, obſerued the ſame precept, which he left to his poſterity and ſucceſſours, for a law of the warre; namely in Deut. 20. Verſe 10. in theſe words; When thou commeſt neere vnto a City to fight againſt it, thou ſhalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries vnto thee, and ſerue thee; but if it refuſe, &c. thou ſhalt ſmite all the males thereof with the edge of the ſword. Which ordinance all commanders of Armies haue obſerued to this day, or ought to haue done.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture, which are loſt.

Num. c. 21. v. 14. NOw concerning the Warre betweene Iſrael and Sehon, Moſes ſeemeth to referre a great part of this Storie to that Booke entituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore paſſeth ouer many encounters, and other things memoramemorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneua Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Riuers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint vary. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the Booke: The warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brookes of Arnon. Iunius for the Red Sea, which is in the Geneuian and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of* Suph, a Countrey bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he coniectureth. The Text he readeth thus. Idcircò dici solet in recensione bellorum Iehouæ, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore is it spoken in repeating of the battailes of Iehouah, against Vaheb in the Countrey of Suph: and against the Riuers, the Riuers of Arnon. In which words he vnderstands, that amongst the warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the warre of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrey neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate predecessour of Balac, who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For it seemes (as it is plaine in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were electiue, and not successiue. And as Iunius in this Translation vnderstandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Booke be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Book of Iudges. Syracides c.46. telles vs plainly, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by Iosua. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a Booke as this there was; wherein the seuerall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished in the long race of time, or haue beene destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Bookes of Henoch, howsoeuer they haue beene in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembred in an Epistle of Thaddaus, and cited by Origen [illegible], and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Bookes remembred by Iosua c.10. v.13. and in the second of Samuel, c.1. v.18. called the Booke of Iasher, or Iustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the middest of the Heauens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had auenged themselues of their enemies: out of which also Dauid tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Iuda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according vnto the sixty and ninth Psalme, Verse 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the Booke of Life, neither let them be written with the righteous. Hierome thinkes, that Dauid by this Booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the Bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the actes of the iust Abraham, of Isaac, Iacob, and Moses, are written; Others, that it was the Booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary vpon Iosua, by an vnknowne Authour.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembred in the second of Chron.33. v.18. & 16. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Authour.

The same mischance came aswell to the Story of Salomon, written by Ahia Silonites, who met with Ieroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdome of Israel from the sonne of Salomon: as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Ieedo the Seer, remembred in the second of Chron. c.9. v.29. with these haue the bookes of Shemaiah and of Iddo, remembred in the second of Chron. c.12. v.15. perished: and that of Iehu the sonne of Hanani, of the acts of Iehosaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c.20. v.34. Also that booke of Salomon which the Hebrewes write Hascirim, of 5000. verses,

Of these and other Bookes many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Hierusalem. But let vs returne thither where wee left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

WHen Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nebo; leauing the City of Midian on his left hand, and attemping nothing vpon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabite on the South-side of Arnon, hauing lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to prouoke them to battaile, God hauing giuen that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciently possest by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sonnes of Anac.

Deut.2.v.9. & 10, 11, & 12.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Iordan, euen to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountaines of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time passe those Mountaines to the East of Basan, but left their Countrey to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the floud: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it selfe, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Iosua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also beene Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chiefe City was Aroer or Ar, neere the Riuer of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gaue the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: and their chiefe City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendi q. Gigantes; Strong men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Prouince, and not farre to the North of Aroer.

Ios.15.v.13.c. 14.v.15.

Now Moses hauing past Arnon, and being encamped at Abarim; and hauing (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrey, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest vpon Vaheb the Moabite, which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and vsurpers, (themselues being of the sonnes of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall prepared to encounter Moses with as much speede as he could, because Moses encamped in the Countrey of his new conquests, to wit, the Plaines of Moab; the two & fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses wasted with the multitude of his people, and cattell. Towards him therefore hasting himselfe, they encountred each other at Iahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were: and descended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now haue taken a ready way and passage into Iudea: being at this time, and after this victory at the bankes of Iordan: yet he knew it to be perilous to leaue so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Basan or Trachonitis: and therefore he led on his Army to inuade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature: and the onely man of marke remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defenced: lying betweene the Mountaine of Hermon (which Mountaine, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir) and the Riuer of Iordan. And it befell vnto the King of Basan (who attended Moses comming at Edrei) as it did vnto Sihon: for he and his sonnes perished, and all his Cities were taken and possest. After this, Moses with-drawing himselfe backe againe to the mountaines of Abarim, left the prosequution of that warre vnto Iair the sonne of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob, euen vnto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his owne name Hauoth Iair: of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Manasse possest the North part as farre as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the Mountaines of Gilead adioyning, was giuen to Reuben and vnto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

AFter these victories, and while Israel soiourned in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (ouer both which Nations it seemeth that Balac King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe) sought, according to the aduice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the loue of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serue their Idols, to diuide them both in Loue and Religion among themselues: thereby the better both to defend their owne interest against them, as also to beate them out of Moab, and the Countries adioyning. The Israelites as they had euer beene inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these euill courses, and thereby drew on themselues the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: Num. 25. v. 9. besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by his commandement put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the sonne of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi a daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the loue and kindnesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in persequuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes, became an Idolater) as he forgaue the rest of Israel, and stayed his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to beare armes, 601730. of which as his last enterprise, Num. 26. v. 51. he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to inuade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the seruice of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Ouer which companies of 12000. Moses gaue the charge to Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the fiue Num. 31. v. 8. Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately beene, the vassals of Sehon, as appeareth by Iosuah. These fiue Princes of the Midianites slaine by Eleazar, were at this time Iosu. 13. v. 21. but the vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eui, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the Dukes of Sehon, saith Iosuah. He slew also all the men, male-children, and women: sauing such as had not yet vsed the company of men, but those they saued, and dispersed them among the children of Israel to serue them. Cap. 13. 21.

And Moses hauing now liued 120. yeeres, making both his owne weakenesse of body Deut. 31. v. 2. knowne to the people, and his vnability to trauaile: and also that he was fore-warned of his end by the Spirit of God: from whom hee receiued a new commandement to as- Deut. 31. v. 2. cend the Mountaines of Abarim, and thereon to render vp his life: He hastned to settle the Gouernment in Iosua: whom hee perswaded with most liuely arguments to prosequute the conquest begunne, assuring him of Gods fauour and assistance therein. And so hauing spent these his later dayes after the Conquest of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Augustine) vsing both arguments, prayers, and threats vnto the people: *Aug. l. 4. de Mirab. sacr. Obſeruations out of the Story of Moſes, how God diſpoſeth both the ſmalleſt occaſions, and the greateſt reſiſtances, to the effecting of his purpoſe.

NOw let vs a little, for inſtruction, looke backe to the occaſions of ſundry of the great euents, which haue beene mentioned in this Story of the life of Moſes, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promiſe, and fore-choiſe of this people) hee wrought in all things elſe by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And ſo we ſhall find that the feare which Pharaoh had of the increaſe of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cauſe of the ſorrowes and loſſe, which befell himſelfe, and the Ægyptian Nation: which numbers when hee ſought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and leſſen, as when hee commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be ſlaine, God (whoſe prouidence cannot be reſiſted, nor his purpoſes preuented by all the fooliſh and ſaluage craft of mortall men) moued compaſſion in the heart of Pharao's owne daughter, to preſerue that child, which afterward became the moſt wiſe, and of all men the moſt gentle and milde, the moſt excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliuerer of his oppreſſed brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharao, and all the flower of his Nation, euen then, when he ſought by the ſtrength of his men of Warre, of his Horſe, and Chariots, to tread them vnder, and bury them in the duſt. The griefe which Moſes conceiued of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne preſence, moued him to take reuenge of the Ægyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatning him to diſcouer the ſlaughter of the Ægyptian, moued him to flie into Midian: the contention betweene the Shepheards of that place, and Iethro's Daughters, made him knowne to their Father: who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of thoſe Siſters: and in that ſolitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes ſheepe, farre from the preſſe of the World, contenting himſelfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Heardſ-man, God found him out in that Deſert, wherein hee firſt ſuffered him to liue many yeeres, the better to know the wayes and paſſages through which he purpoſed that he ſhould conduct his people, toward the Land promiſed: and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his will and diuine pleaſure for his returne into Ægypt. The like may be ſaide of all things elſe, which Moſes afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Iſrael before remembred. There is not therefore the ſmalleſt accident, which may ſeeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no conſequence: but that the ſame is cauſed by God to effect ſomewhat elſe by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greateſt worldly importance, either preſently, or in many yeeres after, when the occaſions are either not conſidered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their comming out of Ægypt; and of the Men of renowne in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Iosua, with the summe of the History of Ioshua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to haue Warre, were diuers wayes, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we looke to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their comming out of Ægypt, had to doe, either in the Wildernesse, or afterward: we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing prouidence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham: and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient iniuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diuersity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serue for such purposes as God had reserued them for. To make these things more manifest, wee must vnderstand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Ægypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories: by processe of time diuided into seuerall Families and names: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabite the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Iebusites, Amorites, Heuites, Hetites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Countrey in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Familie, and strangers in that Countrey: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more then the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Iordan: yet now euen they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old petigree from Abraham. Exod. 17. 16.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselues and matched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre possest themselues of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equall in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Esau the Idumæans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest sonne of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are ioyned as of the same Nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue beene a Tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason conuinceth Deut. 11. 5.

* It seemeth also that Hus, the Sonne of Nachor, & Buz, his Brother, planted themselues in the Eastside of Iordan, about Basan: where they finde the Land of Hus: in which Iob dwelt as one of the issue of Hus the Sonne of Nachor, & Elihu, his friend which is called a Buzit. See hereafter cha. 10. §. 7.

uinceth it to haue beene otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endlesse warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest sonne Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathæi. Now euen as Abraham besought God to blesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelue Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betweene Hauilath vpon Tigris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petræa. Yet howsoeuer the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: it is not vnlikely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Cannan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so vnited, in and among themselues, but that they had their iealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselues, whether they stood apart or vnited, they were taught by the care of their owne preseruation, to ioyne themselues together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resoluedly as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans onely denied the Hebrewes a passage; which the Moabites durst not denie: because their Countrey lay more open; and because themselues had lately beene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interiacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountaines which diuided it from Iazer. Againe, that which moued the Moabites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselues might recouer againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betweene the mountaines of Arabia and Iordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceiued that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian as aforesaide, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred vp to enmity against Israel. And as for diuers of the rest that were descended from Abrahams kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, betweene the Authors of their Petigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were presages of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed, by the memory of old grudges: and withall by some disdaine from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Iacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being naturall men, might scorne to giue place, much lesse to subiect themselues to their inferiours, as they tooke it: and for a more aggrauation, the issues of Esau Princes of Edumæa, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Iacobs taking his aduantage, and that he was deceiued of his fathers blessing also by him: and that Iacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumæa.

Exod. c. 17, v. 16.

Gen. 17.

Numb. c. 21. v. 24.

Gen. 25. Gen. 27. Gen. 33. 14.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remaine as a seede or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar: and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to releeue them. Ismael also had an Ægyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau tooke two wiues of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon, the Hittite, and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Heuite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumæa.

Gen. 36.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in processe of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuersation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wiues of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-liuing God.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Petigree) we find foure named by Moses: and one and thirty remembred by Iosua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adioyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Heuites, &c. and so here we vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seauen principle Families should be rooted out: and that his owne people should inherite their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Iordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choysest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Heuites, whom Simeon and Leui slew, together with his sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their sisters rauishment. Gen. 34.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wildernesse in the edge of Edumea. Num. 21. 1.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arriuall had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petrea or Nabathea, and thrust them ouer Arnon into the Deserts, the same whom Moses ouerthrew in the plaines of Moab: at which time he tooke Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Num. 21. 24. Ios. 9. Ioseph. ant. lib 4. c. 5.

Presently after which victory, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley betweene the Mountaines Traconi or Galaad and Iordan, who was also a King of the Amorites. Num. 21. 35.

The fift was Adonizedek King of the Iebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Iarmuth.

Iapia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell: and hanged by Iosua. After this ouerthrow Iosua nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and Iosua 10. Ioseph. ant. lib. 5. cap. 1.

Iobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seemed to haue some Dominion ouer the rest; for it is saide in the Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all those Kingdomes. Iosua 11. v. 10

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbes of the hands and feete of seauenty Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who, after Iuda and Simeon had vsed the same exequution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died. Iud. 1. Ioseph. lib. 5. cap. 2.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppresst twenty yeeres, after the death of Ehud, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (encouraged by Debora) ouerthrew; and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a naile driuen into his head while he slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre. Iud. 4. Iud. 4. Psal. 83.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathea: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abrahams sonne, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethegleus or Iethres, saith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Iudges, the sonne of Dathan, the grand-child of Iexanis, or Iokshan, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, Ioseph. l. 5. c. 6. Exod. 3.

Cedren: pag. 34. thura, was Prieſt or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whoſe Daughter or Neece, Moſes married: and of whom I haue ſpoken elſewhere more at large. This Iethro if he were not the ſame with Hobab, muſt be his father: and this Hobab had ſeauen daughters. He guided Moſes in the Wilderneſſe: and became one of the Iſraelites: of him deſcended the Kenites, ſo called of his father Raguels ſurname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the ſecond, euen now remembred.

Iud. 1.

At ſuch time as Saul inuaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Iſrael, gaue them warning to ſeparate themſelues: and yet the Kenites had ſtrong ſeates, and liued in the mountaines of the Deſerts.

1 Sam. 15. 6.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were theſe:

1. Homer the Heuite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Eſſebon
4. Og of Baſan
5. Adonizedek the Iebuſite, King of Hieruſalem

After the death of Barac, Iudge of Iſrael, the foure laſt named of theſe Madianite Kings, vexed Iſrael ſeuen yeeres: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and ſlaine by the Ephraimites, at the paſſage of Iordan, as in the 6.7. and 8. of Iudges it is written at large. Afterward in the purſuite of the reſt, Gideon himſelfe laide hands vpon Zebah and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and execuuted them, being priſoners; in which expedition of Gideon there periſhed 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumæans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will ſpeake hereafter in the deſcription of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites, and Iſmaelites.

IF the Kings of the Amalekites and Iſmaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Iſmaelites there were more in number than of the reſt (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according vnto the promiſe of God made vnto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites were numbred among them, were more renowned in Moſes time than the reſt of the Iſmaelites. So alſo were they when Saul gouerned Iſrael. For Saul purſued them from Sur vnto Hauilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petræa, and the Deſert. The reaſon to me ſeemeth to be this: That the twelue Princes which came of Iſmael, were content to leaue thoſe barren Deſerts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the iſſue of Abraham by Cethura, Gen. 17. 20. Iud. c. 7.

that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue beene, and so were the Madianites:) themselues taking possession of a better soyle in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petræa. For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelue Princes planted that part of Arabia Petræa, which was very fruitfull though adioyning to the Desert, in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathea: the same which neighboureth Iudea on the East-side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathei (B) changed into (P).

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sonnes, gaue his owne name to the East-part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward possest by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountaines Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Plinie Cedræans.

Abbeel sate downe in the Desert Arabia, neere the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happy: and gaue name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Mibsam was the Parent of the Masamancuses, neere the Mountaine Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Mishma: who ioyned to the Orchens, neere the Arabian gulfe, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumæans, betweene the Adubens and Raabens: where the Citie Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Athrita, who bordered the Napatheans in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Ituræans, or Chamathens: of whom Tohu was King in Dauids time.

Of Naphri the Nubeian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adadezer commanded, while Dauid ruled Israel. P in.1.6.c.28.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonæans: who were afterward called Asita: because they worshipped the fire with the Babylonians. Iunius.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Ægyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans Aretas, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished. Exo l.17.

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neere Cadesbarne. Num. 14.

After the gouernment of Othoniel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Madianites: and inuaded Israel. God commanded that as soone as Israel had rest; they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul exequuted in part, when he wasted them from the border of Ægypt, to the border of Chaldæa: from Hauilah to Shur.

In Dauids time they tooke Siklag in Simeon: but Dauid followed them, and surprised them, recouering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse. 1 Sam.30: 2 Sam:8.12.

In Ezekias time as many of them as ioyned to Edumæa were wasted and displanted by the children of Simeon. 1 Chron 4.

§. IIII.

Of the instauration of ciuility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

THere liued at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, so did Art and Ciuility (bred and fostered farre off in the East, and in Ægypt) begin at this time to discouer a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Iudea. For if Pelasgus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbes and Rootes: wee may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsely those Nations haue vaunted of those their antiquities accompanied not onely with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: Aug. l. 18. c. 8: de Ciuit: Dei. Nam propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientiæ doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisedome: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the inuention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inuenta sapientiæ pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire, was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Againe, it is written of him, that he had the art so to vse this fire, as thereby he gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued, had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Egle, was meant the inward care and restlesse desire he had to inuestigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies, for so it is saide: Ideò altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, vt sereno cælo quàm longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discerne afarre off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diuersly.

Africanus makes Prometheus farre more ancient, and but 94. yeeres after Ogyges. Porphyrius sayes that he liued at once with Inachus, who liued with Isaac.

Aug: lib. 18. c: 3. De Ciuit. Dei.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it be saide, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the aduantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sonnes of Iapetus, Æschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Euening, and so to the euening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adioyning tooke name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec verò Atlas sustinere cælum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucaso, nec stellatus Cepheus cum vxore traderetur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be saide to beare vp heauen, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stellified; vnlesse their diuine knowledge had raised vpon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime expresst Time by Prometheus, sometime he tooke him for Saturne; as Rhea coniux almi Promethei. But that the story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approued Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue not doubted; For the great iudgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith Saint Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Arethas the sonne of Orchomenus challengeth the inuention. Of this Arcas Arcadia in Peloponnesus tooke name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone. Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be vnderstood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is saide, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

AND in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argiues. This Deucalion was the sonne of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssees, makes Deucalion the sonne of Minos: but he must needes haue meant some other Deucalion, for else either Vlysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Vlysses after his returne from Troy, fained himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Minos: but this Minos liued but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that warre) and this Deucalion the sonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie: by which in effect euery soule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this floud in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractiue of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule sinnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankinde drew on them that generall destruction by the floud vniuersall. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be louers of Vertue, of Iustice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

Clem: Alex: strom: lib: 1. Strabo: lib: 9.

Non illa melior quisquam, nec amantior aequi
Vir fuit: aut illa reuerentior vlla deorum.

No man was better, nor more iust than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing; and aduised him to prouide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cibotium, and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Doue, to discouer the waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that this Story had beene but an imitation of Noahs floud deuised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and Saint Augustine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this story of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melantho, on whom Neptune is saide to haue begot Delphus, which gaue name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

August. de Ciuit: Dei: l. 18: c. 10. ex Eusebio & Hieronymo.

And that which was no lesse strange and maruailous than this floud, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened vnder Phaeton; not onely in Aethiopia, but in Iliria, a Region in Italie, and about Cume, and the Mountaines of Vesuuius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BVt of all other which this age brought foorth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus; and of the Greekes, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Augustine & Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many workes some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon fiue Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Ægypt, and there worshipped; one, the sonne of Nilus, whose name the Ægyptians feared to vtter, as the Iewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Ægypt, is saide to haue deliuered literature to the Ægyptians, and to haue giuen them Lawes. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Ægypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Theuet; whom Philo Biblius writeth Taautus; the Ægyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrians Thot; and the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who liued about the warre of Troy, giues the inuention of letters. But Saint Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Ægyptians, calles neither of them the sonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to haue slaine Argus. For he finds this Mercury, the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-childe of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L: Viues vpon Saint Augustine seemes to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembred. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Græcian Mercury brought letters into Ægypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Ægypt or Phœnicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Græcian into Ægypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bœotia, either out of Ægypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that betweene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argiues, with whom Moses liued, and in whose time about his tenth yeere Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleuen yeeres; after him Danaus fifty yeeres; after him Lynceus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arriued in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Ægypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Ægypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters and taught the vse of them to the Iewes; of whom the Phœnicians their Neighbors receiued them; and the Greekes of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this inuention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Iewes and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For euery Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, vpon part of whose workes hee Commenteth, to haue beene foure descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calles Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counsailer and Instructer of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giueth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lod. Viues vpon the sixe and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Booke of Saint Augustine, De Ciuitate Dei, conceiueth, that this Mercury, whose workes are extant, was not the first which was entituled, Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child.* Sanchoniaton, an ancient Phœnician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturne, and called by the Phœnicians, Taautus; and by the Ægyptians Thoot, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many yeeres which he is saide said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeeres, gaue occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which haue collected the grounds of the Ægyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inuentor of the Ægyptian Wisedome, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned. Viues in lib. 8 c. 26. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei.

It is true, that although this Mercurie or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in manie particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approuing of Images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoeuer shall read him with an euen iudgement, will rather resolue, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Ægyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and Spirit deuised. For there is no man of vnderstanding, and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrarie in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reuerend and diuine, vnto almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had beene found in all things like themselues: I thinke it had not beene perilous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Ægyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuised by the first, and more ancient Mercurie, which others haue thought to haue been Ioseph, the son of Iacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaohs dreames, they called Saphanet phane, which is as much to say, as absconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But these are ouer-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Enuie & aged time hath partlie defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoeuer he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem diuinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Maiestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, ijsdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hee hath written many bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which hee affirmeth the Maiestie of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which wee doe. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Ægyptians and Græcians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whatsoeuer is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eius esse prodians, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding, most perfect, and generatiue, and operatiue, falling vpon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And hee was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate vnum esse Deum asserens; Because hee spake of the Trinitie, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie. Hic ruinam (saith Ficinus) præuidit priscæ Religionis, hic ortum nouæ fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem seculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercurie foresaw the ruine of the olde or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the comming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the Blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned. Masius. L. 1. c. 6. f. l. 4. In Præf. Mer. Trismeg.

To this I will onely adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volteran out of Suidas. Hactenus filij pulsus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumq; post paulum à vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Ciuitatem regredior, ad quam vniuersiciues mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui ciues suos replet suauitate mirifica: ad quam hac, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O Sonne, being driuen from my Country, I haue liued a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safety. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood depart from you, see that you doe not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the onely God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with a sweetnesse more then marueilous:

marueilous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death then a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus conuerted by others, agreeing in sense but not in words with Suydas: O cælum magni Dei sapiens opus, teq; O vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando vniuersum constituit mundum, adiuro per vnigenitum eius verbum, & Spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini mei; I adiure thee O heauen, thou wise worke of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first vttered, when he framed the whole World, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Haue mercy vpon me.

But Suydas hath his inuocation in these words: Obtestor te cælum magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris quam loquutus est primùm, cum omnem mundum firmauit, obtestor te per vnigenitum Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto; I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voyce of the Father, which hee spake first when he established all the world, I beseech thee by the onely begotten Word containing all things, be fauourable, be fauourable.

§. VII.

Of Iannes and Iambres, and some other that liued about those times.

THere were also in this age both Æsculapius, which after his death became the God of Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Viues thinkes in his Commentary vpon *Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei. lib.*8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres, who in that impious art excelled all that euer had beene heard of to this day: and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiarity with Diuels, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldome came out of his mouth; how-euer by the Septuagint they are called Sophistæ or Venefici and Incantatores, Sophists, poysoners, and Inchanters: by Hierome, sapientes & malefici; Wise men, and euill doers: and so by Vatablus, who also vseth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes to attribute somewhat of what they did to naturall Magick: calling them, φαρμακεῖς, workers by drugs. The Geneuian, Sorcerers and Inchanters: Iunius Sapientes, præstigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wisemen here by him are taken in one sense: and Prestigiators are such, as dazell mens eyes, and make them seeme to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (Religion and superstition hauing one face and countenance) so did the workes and workings of Moses, and of Pharaos Sorceres appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Diuell changeth himselfe into an Angell of light: and imitateth in all he can the wayes and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary euery worke which surmounteth the wisedome of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the helpe or ministery of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things, are such as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to vnderstand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, and aboue nature or art: which two speculations of workes of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Beresith, & opus de mercana: the one they call Sapientiam naturæ; The Wisedome of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis; The Wisedome of diuinity: the one Iacob practised in breeding the pied Lambes in Mesopotamia, the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Ægypt, hauing receiued from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so farre as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he vsed to his glory that gaue them: assuming to himselfe nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also Saint Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Ægypt, to the death of Iosua, diuers other famous men liued in the World, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and intentions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Græcians the vse of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musicall playes to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrennesse and scarcity vpon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoyled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Erictheonius institute the like games to Minerua: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyle, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Oliue.

In this age also Xanthus rauished Europa: and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos; which three are also giuen to Iupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelue labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthus a City of Peloponnesus: (or as others say, onely nursed and brought vp there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Ægyptian: Manifestum fit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Ægyptium ad Gades peruenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terræ (saith Philostratus;) It is manifest that it was the Ægyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which trauailed as farre as the streights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania. Lib. de Christ. Dei, cap. 12. Philost. l. 2.

But whosoeuer they were, or how worthy soeuer they were that liued in the dayes and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things; whom he fauoured more; to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; neuer any man more familiar and conuersant with Angels; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge, neuer a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that receiued and deliuered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein, that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloued of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Authour) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the feare of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to heare his voyce, sanctified him with faithfulnesse and meekenesse, and chose him out of all men. Syrac. 45. 12. 3

He is remembred among prophane Authours; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick: by Megastenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long liues which the Patriarchs enioyed before the floud, remembred by Moses, Estieus, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecatæus, Elanicus, Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall floud which God reuealed vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Estieus, and Sybilla haue approued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecatæus wrote a Booke of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the Bookes of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, he saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Vrien, excelled all men in wisedome: and by whom the Astrology of the Chaldeans was inuented. Is iustitia pietateq; sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Authour) sic Deo gratus fuit, vt diuino præcepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibiq; habitauerit; For his iustice and piety he was so pleasing vnto God, as by his commandement he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus, in his second Booke and fifth Chapter, speaketh reuerently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authours, which doe confirme the Bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospell, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words. Moses enim affirmabat, docebatq; Ægyptios non rectè sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemq; Afros & Græcos, qui Dijs hominum figuram affinxerunt: id verò solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod cœlum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profectò imaginem, nemo sanæ mentis, alicuius earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effictione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmed and taught, that the Ægyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Affricans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shapes of men: whereas that onely is God indeede, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heauen, the World, and the nature of all things, whose Strabo l. 16.

image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out vnto the likenes of those things, which are mongst vs: That therefore (all deuising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected vnto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Ægyptian wisedome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisedome of the Ægyptians, and was mighty in his works and words; the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Iudeus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and diuided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

Act. c. 7. v. 22.

In the Mathematical part, which is distinguish't into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musicke; the ancient Ægyptians exceeded all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was vsefull vnto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely ouerflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Countrey being a lenell and spacious Plaine, free and cleere from the clouds, yeelded them delight with ease, in obseruing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmeticke also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musicke they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisedome, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starres haue a certaine fouent heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and bee from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper soules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisedome, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleeueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Ægypt; partly by meanes of the temperatenesse of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensiue; and partly through the fertilitie, that Nilus giueth in those places; That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue beene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankinde, haue beene Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they preuailed ouer their enemies. Moreouer, the Ægyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this later Ægyptian learning into three seuerall sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotall, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kindes: the one proper, which it expresseth by letters Alphabeticall in obscure and figuratiue words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other symbolicall, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropicall, and Ænygmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropicall or transferent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and of men. So with the Ægyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone:

by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulneſſe: by a Lyon, Fortitude: by a Horſe, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fiſh, Hatred is to be vnderſtood: Ænigmaticall is a compoſition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which ſenſe, the monſtrous Image of a Lyons body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to ſignifie, that to men all diuine things are Ænigmaticall and obſcure. So the Image of the Sunne ſet on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aſwell in the Waters, as on Land) expreſſeth that the Sunne nouriſheth Meteors in the Ayre, aſwell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, ſignifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Gouerning all things. The Scythians are thought to haue been delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius ſending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and deſtruction of his Kingdome, vnleſſe he would acknowledge ſubiection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouſe, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-ſhare: which Orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to ſignifie, that by the mouſe, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were ſignified to be ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodres made another conſtruction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did haſten away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creepe into holes as a mouſe, or runne into the waters which they had paſſed as a Frog, they ſhould not eſcape his armes, but either be ſlaine, or being made Captiues, Till his grounds. The ſame Hiſtory is with little difference reported by Herodotus. Herod: l. 4

The fourth and laſt part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe eſpecially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, or Ter Maximus deuiſed: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Aſclepius, hath written ſo many things of God, worthy of admiration; aſwell (ſaith Sixtus Senenſis) of the Trinity, and of the comming of Chriſt, as of the laſt and fearefull day of Iudgement: that (as ſaith the ſame Authour, the opinion being alſo ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philoſopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Myſteries of the Ægyptians, taking two very ancient Hiſtorians for his Authours, to wit, Seleucus and Menæus, affirmeth that this Mercury was not onely the Inuentor of the Ægyptian Philoſophy, but of all other learning, called, the Wiſedome of the Ægyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that ſubiect 36525. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Aereall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celeſtiall a thouſand; which becauſe they were out of the Ægyptians language conuerted by certaine learned Philoſophers into the naturall Greeke, they ſeemed to haue beene firſt written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wiſedome of the Ægyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Phyſicke ſixe bookes; of the orders of Prieſts ten; and of Aſtrology foure. Clem: Strom: l: 6.

A Briefe of the Hiſtory of Ioſua; and of the ſpace betweene him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of ſome Contemporaries to Ioſua: and of the breach of Faith.

AFter the death of Moſes, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egreſſion, in the firſt moneth called Niſan, or March, Ioſua the ſonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wiſedome, tooke on him the gouernment of Iſrael: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to paſſe the Riuer of Iordan, and to poſſeſſe, and diuide among the Iſraelites the Land promiſed.

The beginning of Ioſuas rule Saint Auguſtine dates with the reigne of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Aſſyria; with Corax the ſixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Danaus gouerned the Argiues; and Erichthonius, Athens. Lib: 18: de Ciuit. Dei, c: 11.

Ioſua imitating in all things his Predeceſſor, ſent ouer Iordan certaine diſcouerers to view the ſeate and ſtrength of Ierico, the next City vnto him on the other ſide of the Riuer, which he was to paſſe ouer. Which diſcouerers being ſaued, and ſent backe by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, becauſe ſhee kept a Tauerne or Victling-houſe, made Ioſua know that the Inhabitants of Ierico, and thoſe of the Countrey about it, hearing of the approach of Ioſ: 2: 1: Ioſ: 2: 11.

Ios. 2. 11. of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egression, Iosua remooued from Sit-

Ios. 3. 3. when the Leuites tooke it vp, and moued towards the Riuer; giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselues of his fauour and

Ios. 1. 12. Hee also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselues (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Iuda had performed. For these Tribes being already prouided of their habitations, and Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice and equalitie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Iordan they rested themselues from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they past ouer to the other side, taking with them twelue stones from the drie ground in the middest of the Riuer: which, for a memorie of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Ios. 4. 19. Citie of Ierico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Iosua gaue commandement, that all borne in the last fortieth yere in the Deserts should be circumcised, which
Ios. 5. 2. ceremonie to that day had beene omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giueth
Aug. q. 3. in Ios. for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That Thom. part 3. quæst. 70. art. 4. ad. 3. the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their remouing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they liued by themselues, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passe-
Ios. 5. 10. ouer now the third time; first, at their leauing Ægypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrie, and hauing, as it were, surfeted on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Iordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sihon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, hee gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three seuerall times; first,
Ios. 14. 3. by Moses to Gad, Ruben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands ouer Iordan; Secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Iuda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth yeere of his gouernment; proued in the 14. of Iosua, v. 10. and a third Ios. 18. diuision was made to the other seuen Tribes at Shilo, where Iosua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his owne books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to vnite themselues together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Gouernours God hath taken away all wisedome and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the inuaders, to themselues, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue been quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such time as Ierico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; fiue of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioyned themselues together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselues to Iosua. Onely fiue (the rest looking on to the successe) namely, the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Iarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselues for resistance: whose Armie beeing by Iosua surprised and broken, themselues despairing to escape by flight, flight, and hopeleſſe of mercy by ſubmiſſion, creeping into a Caue vnder ground, were thence by Ioſua drawne forth and hanged. In the proſequution of which victory he alſo tooke Makkedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gezar haſtened, and periſhed. After which Ioſua poſſeſt himſelfe of Eglon, Hebron, aud Debir, deſtroying the Cites with their Princes. Ioſ: 10.

In the end, and when the South Countries were poſſeſt, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made duſt: the reſt of the Canaanites, guided by the ouer-late counſailes of neceſſitie, vnited themſelues, to make one groſſe ſtrength and body of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practiſed and gathered together, by Ioſua diſcouered, as the ſame reſted neere the Lake of Merom, he vſed ſuch diligence, as he came on them vnawares; and obtaining abſolute victory ouer then, he proſecuted the ſame to the vttermoſt effect. And, beſides the ſlaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reſerving the reſt for Iſrael to inhabite and enioy. Ioſ: 10:

Secondly, I note, that Ioſua ſhewed himſelfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in thoſe ancient times he vſed the ſtratagem of an ambuſh in taking of Ai; and in that hee broke the Armies of the firſt fiue Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by ſurpriſe. For he marched all night from his campe at Gilgal, and ſet on them early the next day; when he ouerthrew Iabin and his confederates, After which, making the beſt profit of his victory, he aſſaulted the great Citie of Hazor. Ioſ: 10. v. 9.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the ſtay of the Riuer Iordan at the Springs, ſo as the Armie of Iſrael paſt it with a drie foote; the fall of Ierico by the ſound of the Hornes; the ſhowres of Haile-ſtones, which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them periſhed than by the ſword of Iſrael: againe, the arreſt of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was ſo much the more lengthened, as the Iſraelites had time to execute all thoſe which fled after the ouerthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke onely proper to the all-powerfull God. Ioſ: 3. v. 13. Cap: 10. v. 11.

Fourthly, out of the paſſage between Ioſua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is ſo plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euaſion, it admitteth no diſtinction, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiouſnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Æquiuocation. For, notwithſtanding that theſe Gibeonites were a people of the Heuites, expreſly and by name, by the commandement of God to be rooted out, and notwithſtanding that they were liers, and deceiuers, and counterfeits, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Ioſua, and the Princes of Iſrael, by faining to bee ſent as Embaſſadours from a farre Countrie, in which trauaile their clothes were worne, their bread mouldie, which they auowed to haue been warme for newneſſe when they firſt ſet out; their barrels and bottels of wine broken; their ſhoes patcht; and their ſacks rent and ragged: Yet Ioſua hauing ſworne vnto them by the Lord God of Iſrael, hee durſt not, though vrged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but hee ſpared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance. Ioſ: 9. Ioſ: 9. from the 5. to the 13. Verſe.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promiſe made, Ioſua had it. For firſt, the commandement which he receiued from God to root out this Nation among the reſt, preceded by farre the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, hee might iuſtly haue put theſe men to the ſword, and haue ſackt their Cities; if there be any euaſion from a promiſe made, whereof the liuing God is called to witneſſe. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gaue peace, becauſe hee knew them to be a people hated of God. Hee told them, that if they were of the Heuites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a ſtrange people that he gaue faith, & to a Nation which came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Iſrael had done in Egypt and ouer Iordan, fought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Iſrael made with theſe craftie Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the ſame place, That the Iſraelites accepted their tale, that is, beleeued what they had ſaid, and counſailed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, theſe men who were knowne Idolaters, and ſerued thoſe Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apiſh Religion, as all Worſhippers of Images are, could not challenge the witneſſe of the true God, in whom they beleeued not. I ſay therefore, that if euer man might haue ſerued himſelfe by any euaſion or diſtinction, Ioſua might iuſtly haue done it. For hee needed Ioſ: 9. Deut. 5. v. 14.

not in this case the helpe of Æquiuocation, or Mentall Reseruation. For what hee sware, he sware in good Faith; but he sware nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuiolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworne it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we feare him not, and that we set him at nought and defie him. If hee that without Reseruation of honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, promiseth in his name, and makes him a witnesse of the Couenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which haue beene made in former times, and confirmed by publike faith. For though it were 400. yeeres after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God who forgat not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieued, and by them hanged vp.

And certainely, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to reserue in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subiects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trialls of right, will not onely be made vncertaine, but all the chaines, whereby free men are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that wee enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the seuerity of Gods Commandements in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answere, That hee breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whosoeuer hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holie Land when they were at the greatest; and had brought the Caliph of Ægypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holie Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadech, and his Vicegerent, The Soldan Sanar; who being sodainely inuaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Syracon to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after hee had made Ægypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holie Land; neither would the woodden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselues in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which slayeth them, slaieth the soule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lye? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victory ouer Amurath the Turke, & when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantagious that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his Faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet hee lost the battaile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bee it against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkeable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To be Thornes in their eyes to proue them, and to teach them to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not only remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforst to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of hardest accesse. And those of Iuda were not able to be Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Iudges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azzah, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Iordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites: which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nepthalims possesse themselues of Bethshemish: nor of Bethanah, but they inforst those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib; Heblah, Aphike, and Rehob, nor inforce them to tribute.

Ios:13.v.13. Iud:1.v.31.

No more could Zabulon enioy Kitron, and Nahalol, but receiued tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Iordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taacnach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megaddo; yea Hierusalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend aboute foure hundred yeeres, euen till Dauids time.

Ios:16.v.10.

Iud:2.v.27.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeares, eighteene of which he gouern d Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him fiue and twentie yeeres, Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie: And Masseus sixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Massius, fourteene: Ioannes Lucidus, seuenteene: Caietanus, ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen & twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, fiue and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeres from the deliuerie of Israel out of Aegypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that wee allow to Iosua onely eighteene of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approued opinion.

The same necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Aegypt vnto the building of the Temple, conuinceth of errour, such as haue inserted yeeres betweene Iosua and Othoniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeres, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapters vpon Iosua: Bunting reckons it nine yeeres: Bucholzer and Reusner but one, Codoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no void yeeres found betweene Iosua and Othoniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eighteene ascribed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The prayses and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the sixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord?

Euseb. Pra. Euang:

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, v. 26. And Iosua wrote these words in the booke of the law of God: which seemeth rather to haue been meant by the couenant which Iosua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serue & obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Caietan and Abulensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceiue that the book of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iustorũ, remembred by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these words of the 26. verse, And Iosua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it, for when the people had answered Iosua; The Lord our God wil we serue, & his voice will we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a couenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

1.12. 13. 5.last v.24.v. 26.

There liued at once with Iosua, Erichthonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fiftie Daughters of Danâus (as it is said) slew the fiftie Sonnes of Ægyptus, all but Lynceus who succeeded Danâus, if the tale be true. There liued also with Iosua, Phœnix, and Cadmus, and neere the end of Iosuas life, Iupiter is said to haue rauished Europa the Daughter of Phœnix, (afterward marryed to Asterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this rauishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, & Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the warre of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Troian war. And so doth Nestor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greeks, Theseus and Perithous for men of Antiquitie, and of ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel, that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with sundrie Stories depending vpon those places.

§. I.

The Proeme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

THE storie of the Iudges ought to follow that of Iosua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Iewes was gouerned by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the tenne Tribes, shall be remembred when we come to the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderstanding of both) to make a Geographicall description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be vnderstood, and conceiued. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue bestowed on euery Tribe his proper portion: and doe shew what Cities and Places of strength were by the Iewes obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leaue vnconquered; by whom hee might correct and scourge them, when vngratefull for his many graces, they at sundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Diuina bonitas (saith Augustine) ideo maximè irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem adhibet seueritatem, ne aternam iustè inferat vltionem; The Diuine goodnesse is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully vse temporall seuerity, that it may not iustly bring vpon vs eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I haue added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-weales: and to helpe my selfe herein, I haue perused diuers of the best Authors vpon this subiect: among whom, because I finde so great disagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in such cases aduentured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their old patternes.

And because Canaan, with Palæstina of the Philistims, and the Lands of Og and Sihon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Prouinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to diuide and bound the generall, and so to descend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Ptol. Asiæ: tab: 4.

Ptol. 5.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, ſhorter, and from the coaſt of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumea towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne riſing, and the Mediterran Sea Weſtward: it then containeth beſides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Deſert, and Arabia Petrea, that Region alſo which the Greekes call Meſopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for ſo Aram Nahairaïm is expounded: alſo Padan Aram: that is, Iugum Syriæ, becauſe the two Riuers goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edeſſa, ſometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many ſmall Prouinces, as Cæleſyria which the Latines call Syria Cana, becauſe it lay in that fruitfull Valley betweene the Mountaines of Lybanus, and Antylibanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were ſeated. Then Damaſcena or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damaſcus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall ſeate of the Adades, the firſt Kings of Syria. Adioyning to it was the Prouince of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: ouer which Adadezer commanded in Salomons time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syraphœnices: and laſtly Syria Paleſtina bordering Ægypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Iudæa alſo a part: and to that Prouince which Moſes calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giueth the name of Syria Iudæa.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan, and of the promiſes touching this Land.

BVt that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and ſtretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Deſerts betweene Idumæa and Ægypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the Weſt, and the Mountaines of Hermon; Galaad and Arnon towards the Eaſt: the ſame Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconitæ, and Ptolomie Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Sonne of Cham, & lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was alſo called Canaan, ſaith Montanus: and after Hebræa of the Hebrewes: who tooke name from Heber, the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Auguſtine. But Arias Montanus not ſo well allowing of this deriuation, makes it a common name to all thoſe of Noahs Sonnes, which paſt ouer Euphrates towards the Weſt Sea. For the word Heber, ſaith hee, is as much as tranſiens or tranſmittens, of going or paſſing ouer. And becauſe the children of Abraham had for a long time no certaine abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Ægyptians called Hebræi, as it were paſſengers, which is alſo the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Euſebius long before them both. It had alſo the name of Iudæa from Iuda; and then afterwards intuled The holy Land, becauſe therein our Sauiour Chriſt was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure; namely, into Edom, (otherwiſe Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Iudæa. Galilee is double, the ſuperior called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Iudæa are diſtinguiſhed, it is plaine in the Euangeliſts, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Now beſides theſe prouinces of Phœnicia, and Paleſtina (both which the Riuer of Iordan boundeth; ſauing that Phœnicia ſtretcheth a little more Eaſterly towards Damaſcus) that part alſo to the Eaſt of Iordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermon Gilead, and Arnon, otherwiſe Traconi, fell to the poſſeſſion of halfe Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan alſo: aſwell becauſe anciently poſſeſt by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enioyed by the Iſraelites, which Eaſtermoſt parts are againe diuided intn Baſan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machati, Geſſuri, Argobe, Hus. They are knowne to the latter Coſmographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Tracomiis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will ſpeake in their proper places.

But where Moſes deſcribeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Geneſis, hee maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, for theſe be his words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou commeſt to Gerar vntill Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goeſt vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboïm, euen vnto Laſha: by which words Moſes ſetteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomie it ſeemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the ſoale of your feet ſhall tread, ſhall be yours: Deut: 11. 24.

your coast shall be from the wildernesse and from Libanon, and from the Riuer Perah, vnto the vttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wildernesse for Gerar and Azzah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petræa, and the Desert as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possest, nor at any time did so much as inuade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue that by the Riuer Perah, was meant Iordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosua: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Iordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

Iosu. 23. v. 4.

And though it be true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holie Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For Dauid did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babilonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods themselues also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heauens were aboue the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other then all mankinde could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perseuer in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eight Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written, Therefore shall ye keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possesse the Land, whither yee goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord sware vnto your Fathers, &c.

Vadian. Epitō. trīū terræ partium cap. Palæstina.

Deut. 11. v. 21.

Deut. 11.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heauens were aboue the earth. For if yee keepe diligentlie, saith hee, all these commandements, which I command you to doe, that is, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and yee shall possesse great Nations, & mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Maiestie, to the Idolatrie of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melanchthon: For, saith hee, Ostendit promissionem præcipuam non esse de hoc Politico regno; He sheweth that his chiefe promise is not of a ciuill Kingdome. To which agrees that answere, which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he ouerthrew the reputation of the Iewes Storie, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viuentium terram quæ in cælis est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the liuing which is in Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudæorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, vt vix longitudinem habeat 160. milliarium, latitudinem verò 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, vrbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam à Iudeis occupata, sed tantùm diuina pollicitatione promissa. Because the whole Countrey of the Iewes is so narrow in compasse, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, & 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countries, places, Cities & many Townes, which the Iewes neuer possest, but were onely granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Esay touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where hee hath these words: De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palæstina Regione petendam: quæ totius Prouinciæ deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur sitis: ita vt ecclesiis vtatur pluuijs, & varietatem fontiū cisternarū extructione soleatur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, festinauerunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palæstina, which is the worst of the whole Prouince, & ragged with with craggie Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preserueth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building of Cesternes; but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened: so farre S. Hierome, where also to preuent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neq; hoc dico in suggillationem terræ Iudææ, vt Hæreticus Sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historiæ veritatem: qua fundamentum est intelligentiæ spiritualis, sed vt decutiam supercilium Iudæorum: qui Synagogæ angustias latitudini Ecclesiæ præferunt. Si enim occidentem tantùm sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vinificantem: ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neyther (saith hee) say I this to disgrace the land of Iudæa (as the Hereticall Sycophant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spirituall vnderstanding, but to beat down the pride of the Iewes: which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honnie.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoeuer it be vnlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literall sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East bound, should be taken onely in a spirituall sense) yet neuertheless that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be vnderstood for Euphrates: and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephtalim, and Zabulon, held the Northermost part, and were seated in Phœnicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to bee mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuersly expressed, so that to the vnskilfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuersitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined others vowels then now the Hebrew editions haue; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe thinke fit.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

HE Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Ægypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men aboue twenty yeeres of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the Riuer of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Sea-coast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, Asser pinguis panis: Concerning Asser, his bread shall be fat; And he shall giue pleasures for a King. Gen. 49.

Of Zidon.

THE first City seated on the North border of the Territorie of Asser, was Zidon, which Iosus calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greekes and Iustin. l. 18. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustine deriues the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidona. But that it

Gen: 10. Ioseph was farre more ancient, Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witnesse, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaans Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosuas time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Asserites, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Iudges and Kings, euen vnto the comming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it Esa: 23. Hier: 47. Ezek. 28. & 32. Zac. 9. was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth betweene it and Tyre, the distance betweene which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, Palest. Seig: f. 19. Vadian. Phœn. f. 278: Strab. l. 16. saith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissinburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make fiue and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betweene these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer-difficult to deuise any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memorie: The story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to bee more ancient then Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strab: l. 16. Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in Zach: 9. v. 2. Herod: l. 5: Plin: l. 5. c. 9. after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principall workemen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wise Zidonians. The Citie was both by Nature & Art exceeding strong, hauing a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South side by the Port of Ægypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Bœotia in Greece.

* It seems that euen in Iosuas time they practised glasse-making, whence Iunius for Misphreboth maiim, which ad verbũ is as much as combustiones aquarũ, reades fornaces vitrarias. Ios. 11. 8. as it seems, because these fornaces were where there was store of water, either for the mouing of the bellows by the force of the water, or for other necessary vses. But there are others that take them for salt pits, & other againe for hot baths. The forme of Astoreth (or Astarte) seemeth to haue been a sheep, for Deut. 7. 13. the word in the plurall number signifieth sheepe: & this may confirm Augustins opinion, that Astarte was Iuno: for the forme of her husband Iupiter Hammon was a Ram.

Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the inuention of * Glasse, which they vsed to make of those sands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neere Ptolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasses which they make at Murana: of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrarijs officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famous Glassemaker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astaroth: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1. Sam. 31. 10. and Iud. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appeares 1. Kings 11. 5. in the storie of Salomons Idolatrie: where Astaroth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Diuers Baals & diuers Astaroths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appeares by the plurall names of Baalim and Astaroth, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euen the name Astaroth, as I am informed by a skilfull Hebritian, is plurall: the singular being Astoreth: whence Iud. 2. 13. the Septuagint reade [illegible] They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Astoreths, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vse to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Augustine quæst. 19. in Iudg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by such a name as Astarte. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to bee Astarte: whom hee makes to bee borne of Tyrus and Syria, and to haue beene the Wife of Adonis: as also Macrob. 2. Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great veneration veneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome vpon *Ezek.*8.44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Ægyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Ægyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoeuer these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Iewes: who had beene taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeeres, whereof our Sauiour in Mathew and Luke: Woe be to the Corazin, &c. for if the great workes which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agone, &c. but I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of iudgement, than for you. Mat.11. v.20:

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Dioceſſe of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleete to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recouered, the commandement thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And again in the yeere 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the Riuer called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quæq; Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop of the Dioceſſe of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, saith Postellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleetes of shippes commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians erected Vtica, Leptis, and Carthage in Affrica, of which Virgil. Vrbs antiqua fuit, Tyrij tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In Spaine they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos Achillis, which City the Scholiast of Apollonius placeth neere the Riuer Phyllis, in Bithynia. Virgil. l.1 Plin.l.5.c.19. Marcelin.l.22.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosua the 19. taking name from the situation, because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra, for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarranum, by which name Iuuenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet Gellius: l.4.c.6

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receiue Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Iland, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middest of the Sea, as some reade, or as others in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it situate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Esay a Mart of the Nations: and so Proude, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manu-facture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Iulius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing along the Sea-cost, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura: the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idols that Zidon did: saue that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony: but this auailed not. For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty stones, from the old City of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Iland: and hauing once approached their Walles, he ouer-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which he caused 2000. more to be hung vp in a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which exequution vpon cold blood he performed (as some Authours affirme) vpon the issues of those slaues which had formerly slaine all their Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Gouernement to themselues. This victory of Alexander ouer the Tyrians, Iosephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat reuolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Prouinciall Gouernour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Iaddus the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine Garizim ouer Samaria: that the forces of the Iewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Iewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius calleth Sanabala, died.

De bell. sacr. l. 13: c. 4.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became enuious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with threescore shippes of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelue saile scattered that fleete, and tooke 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lieutenants fiue yeeres, but with ill ſucceſſe. And this ſiege Menander Epheſius, cited by Ioſephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Story among the Annalls of the Tyrians (which the ſaide Menander conuerted into Greeke) adding, that Elulæus, whom Tyrius calleth Heliſæus, was then King of Tyre, hauing gouerned the ſame ſixe and twenty yeeres. Soone after this repulſe of Salmanaſſar, and about 200. yeeres before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonoſor at ſuch time as he deſtroyed Hieruſalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeede gaue to Alexander the example of that deſpairefull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonoſor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the ſtrength of the Sea, the ſame cawſey and paſſage was againe broken downe, and demoliſhed.

Et cont. Ap. 1. Guil. Tyrius de Bell. Sacr. 13. 4. Ioſeph: Ant. lib. 9. cap. 15.

Againſt Nabuchodonoſor, for many yeeres, the Tyrians defended themſelues: for ſo long did theſe Babylonians continue before it, As euery head was made bald, and euery ſhoulder made bare, ſaith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Eſay had manifeſtly foretold the deſtruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirteene yeeres ſiege or more, the Tyrians deſpoiled of all their hopes, and remembring ouer-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number of ſhippes, abandoned their City, tranſporting with themſelues the ableſt of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches ſayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: ſo as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to ſatisfie ſo many labours and perils, or any perſon vpon whom to auenge themſelues for the loſſe of ſo many bodies in that Warre: It pleaſed God in recompence thereof (who ſtrengthened this reſolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonoſor victorious ouer the Ægyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the ſpoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaueth not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happineſſe reſerued for his Seruants and Saints: yet ſuch is the boundleſſe goodneſſe of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall bleſſings.

Now of this enterpriſe of Nabuchodonoſors againſt Tyre, prophane Hiſtorians haue not beene ſilent. For both Diocles, and Philoſtratus (as Ioſephus citeth them) the one in his ſecond Booke, the other in his Phœnician Hiſtories, remember it.

Ioſe: ant. l. 10 c. 13.

After theſe two great Vaſtations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this City of Tyre repaired and recouered it ſelfe againe: and continued in great glory about 300 yeers, euen to the comming of our Sauiour Chriſt: and after him flouriſhed in the Chriſtian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbiſhop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Hieruſalem onely, who within his owne Dioceſſe and foureteene great Cities, with their Biſhops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwiſe Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cæſarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthoſia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Tortoſa) and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the reſt of that beautifull Region of Phœnicia and Paleſtina, ſubiected to the cruell and faithleſſe Saracen. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whoſe tyranny it ſuffered with the other Paleſtine Cities 488. yeeres.

Gul. Tyr. l. 11. Bell. ſacr. 17.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hieruſalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Hieruſalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the ſecond, with the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, and their fleete of Gallies, it was againe recouered, and ſubiected to the Kings of Hieruſalem, and ſo it remained 165. yeeres.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladine hauing firſt taken Hieruſalem, remoued his whole Army and ſate downe before Tyre: drawing his fleete of ſhippes and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Chriſtian power.

The Citizens finding themſelues reduced into great famine, and many other miſeries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleete, and ſallying out reſoluedly vpon his armie, ſlew ſo great numbers of them, and followed their victory with ſuch fury, as that the Saracens forſaking their Trenches and Tents, remoued in great diſorder and diſhonour. Two yeeres after which victory the body of that famous Fredericke Barbaroſſa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Chriſtians enemies ouer a Riuer vnfoordable, periſhed by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedrall Church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garniſhed and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeeres before before therein buried: but in the yeere 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turkes.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

THe third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtaine, on the South bound of Asser was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomy. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos.

Plin. lib. 5. c. 19
In descrip. terr. sanct:

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Ægyptian Ptolomies: which City also as it is, 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliously wrested from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander hauing married Cleopatra daughter of the saide Ptolomie not long before. Therein also was Ionathan Macchabæus treacherously surprized and slaine, as it is 1 Mac. 12.48. by the perfidiousnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and by like reason about the same time was the aforesaide Alexander in the warre against Demetrius, one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolomie ioyned, ouerthrowne & treacherously murthered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolomie: who enioyed not the glory of his victory and treason aboue three dayes, for God strucke him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seate; two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the Port for safety and capacity not inferiour to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hierusalem some foure and thirty miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middest of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Bel-zebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called Pharus in Ægypt: to giue comfort in the night to those shippes, which came neere and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Dioceese of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the yeere 636. (a fatall yeere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the yeere 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the reuenew was giuen in recompence. Againe, in the yeere of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourescore and seuen, Saladine King of Ægypt, and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeere of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redeliuered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeere 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and vtterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

FIue miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was borne: the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were driuen to make such an erection vpon a fable, or person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Asser, to haue beene in the fields of Libanus: betweene the River Adonis, and Zidon: his owne wordes are these:

In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit ædificata; In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called* Cappadocia, not farre from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and hauing killed the beast, deliuered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deede a Church was after built there: Thus farre Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodouicus Roman. Patric. Nauigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Asser, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegoricall, figuring the victory of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BEtweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Seacoast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which Saint Hierome calleth Achziph, and Iosephus Ecdippos, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Asserites. Belforrest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelue searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauailed as farre to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Asser, which Rechob, as also Berothæ which by Ezekiel cap. 47. verse 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Hadarhezer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. chap. and 8. verse, and chap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did. Hieron. de Locis Hebr. Ios. Bell. Iud. l. 1. c. 11. Plin. l. 5. c. 19.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling downe, slew seuen and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had beene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Ahab. Here Iunius finds that the Philistims encamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue beene in Iuda. Of which Ios. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reades, Fortiter, for in Aphek. Where others conuert it, Percutiens Syros in Aphek. 1 Kin. 20. 29. 1 Sam. 29. 1.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betweene Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the yeere of Christ 1157. when he vndertooke the recouery of Tyre.

Not much aboue a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentifull Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of liuing Waters: from whence not onely all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawne: but the same Spring, which hath not aboue a bow-shot of ground to trauaile till it recouer the Sea, driueth sixe great Milles in that short passage, saith Brochard. Cant. 4. Itin. 1.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hosa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achsaph, or Axab, or after Saint Hierome Aciſap, a City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iosua, at the waters of Merom. Ios. 12. 20.

†. VII.
Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

FArther into the Land towards Iordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Easter-most Hilles of Tyre, in the yeere 1107. thereby to restraine the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recouery of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the third, King of Hierusalem, lyeth buried: There were fiue Castles besides this within the Territory of Asser: wherewhereof foure are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium, and Belfort: The first neere the Sea vnder the Hilles of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and Fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselues, and gaue succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possest the best part of the vpper Galilee) the chiefe of which Order was in Ptolomais Acon. The first Fortresse was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the Riuer Naar, neere the City Roma: of which in this Tribe Ios. 19.29. for which the Vulgar reades Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Ægypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulsed.

Herold. l. 2. c. 4. Continuations Bell. ac.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which Saint Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselues against Asser, as Roob (or Rechob) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod, surnamed the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabol, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Weisshenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Salomon presented vnto him in recompence of those prouisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others thinke this Chabol or Cabul, containing a circuit of those twenty Cities giuen to Hiram, to haue beene without the compasse of the holy Land: though bordering Asher on the North-side: as it is saide, 1 Reg. 9. 11. that they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrey: for it was not lawfull, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoeuer, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appeares 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seemes they were conquered by David from the Syri Rechobea, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Iun. annot. in 1 Reg. 9. 11.

2 Sam. 10. 8.

Almost of equall distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Iordan: Giscala was made famous by Iohn the sonne of Leui, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred Theeues, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Iudæa: by whose practise Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly indangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This Iohn betraying in all he could the City of Giscala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gaue opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time forst it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosepus authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They find also the Cities of Cana Maior, and * Cades, (or Cedessa) of the first was that Syro-phœnician, whose Daughter Christ deliuered of the euill Spirit. Neere the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabæus ouerthrew the Army of Demetrius.

Of the Riuers and Mountaines of Asser.

THe Riuers to the North of Asser, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler ioyneth Lycus, Ptolomie, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus: which Riuer of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere vnto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding, where Ptolomie doth, betweene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which hee also citeth Plinie; and the first of Machabees the 11. Chapter, but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Asser: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Balanea, witnesse Ptolomie: and therefore Pinetus calleth it Valania, and Postellus Velana: which Riuer boundeth Phœnicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principall Riuer of Asser, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christianus Schrot out of the mouth and Papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the maine Riuer Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the streames which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the City adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another Riuer described by Adrichome, named Iepthael, which I finde in no other Authour, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word [d] Ghe which is added there to Iepthael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneua, and Arius Montanus turne it. There is also found in Asser, the Riuer of Belus, remembred by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith * Plinie: out of the sands of this Riuer are made the best Glasse, which sometime the Zidonians practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Cendeuia, as all Cosmographers both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Trauailers into those parts witnesse. It is true that the Riuer of Chison taketh water from Chedumim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South betweene Caiphas and Sicaminum, witnesse Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

[d] The word Nachal is ambiguous, either for a Valley or for a Riuer: but this word Ghe is alway a valley, as in Gehinnon and Gesselemanim.
Ioseph. lib. 2. Bell. Iud. c. 3.
* L. 5. c. 19. in Iosua, c. 19. v. 26. It is called Shicor, of which name many vnderstand an other streame. Ios. 13. 3. which running by Petra of Arabia, falleth into the Lake Sirbonis, & diuideth Egypt from the promised land whereabout they place Rhinocolura, for which city Iunius taketh Sichor in that place of Iosua: but howsoeuer whether this Sichor, Ios. 13. 3. be a Riuer or a city, it appears that this name is found, both in the North bound of the holy Land, Ios. 19. 26. & in the South bound, Ios. 13. 3.

Besides these Riuers there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of liuing waters adioyning to Tyre: and [a] Maserephot, or after Saint Hierome, Maserephotmaim, whose Well filled by the floud of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mountaines which bound Asser on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœlesyria: two great ledges of Hilles, which from the Sea of Phœnicia and Syria, extend themselues farre into the Land East-ward: foure hundreth stadia or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giueth to the Valley of Cœlesyria: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie gines them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Theipsophon, or Deifacies, neere Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desert Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phœnicians Syrion, and the Amorites Sanir, neither is this any one Mountaine apart; but a continuation of Hilles: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Hieremy proueth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of those Hilles of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Traconitæ: and Ptolomie by Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Asser, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giueth no reason of his opinion.

[a] See the marginall Note aboue in the second Section of this Paragraph.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are couered with Snow all the Summer, the Hebrew word Libanos (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Frankincense which those Trees yeeld: because λίβανος is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

The Riuers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoas, Iordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountaines of Asser, are those Hilles aboue Tyre, and the Hilles of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountaine of Abarim, in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

†. I.
Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the vpper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the sonne of Iacob by Bilha, the hand-maide of Rachel: who while they abode in Ægypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to beare armes, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leauing their bodies in the Deserts, there entred the Holy Land of their Sonnes 45400. besides, Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twenty yeeres of age. The Land of Nephtalim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Iordan, and the Hilles of Libanus adioyning, as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and on the East and South-east by Iordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adioyning to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabite, in which Tract and vnder Libanus, was the City of Heliopolis: which the heighth of the Mountaines adioyning shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. Postellus calles it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclauius, Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Ægypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldæan Paraphrast, otherwise Bethsemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis; The City of the Sunne: into which, saith Vlpian, Seuerus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other Gestelius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a City in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adioyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, ouer which Herod, Agrippa, and Berenice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gaue name to the Region adioyning, of which Lysanius the sonne of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Gouernour: whereof Ptolomie gaue it the addition of Lysanij, and called it Abila Lysanij. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was natiue, who by Volaterran is intituled Aphileus, not Abileus. After that this City of Abila or Aphila, had receiued the Christian Faith, Priscillinus became the Bishop thereof: slaine afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this City (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembred that in the Tribe of [a] Manasse, ioyning vpon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another City of the same name, sauing that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembred in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Iosephus calles Abelmachea, and Hierome Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel for distinction sake it is written, Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Towne of Mahaca, the wife of Macir, the sonne of Manasse, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Maim. This City Ioab besieged: because Seba the sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thereinto for succour: but a certaine wise woman of the City perswading the people to cast Seba his head ouer the wall, Ioab retired his Army. The same City was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

a Also a third in Ephraim called Abel Mechola, and a fourth in Reuben, called Abel-Sittim, also Abel-Mastraim, at the Foord of Iordan, and (as it seems) in the same Tribe of Reuben, of all which in that which followes: to which also we may adde Abel-Magnum, the name as some thinke of a City, otherwise called Bethshemes, neere the border of the Philistims, or according to others of the great stone in the border.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground, and therefore no maruell, that many Townes (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for euen of bewailing many places tooke name, as Bochim, Iudg. 2.

and

and ſo doubtleſſe* Abel-Miſraim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Iunius in his note vpon Num. 33. 49. thinkes that Abel-Sittim was ſo called, rather by reaſon of the plaine ground there (to wit, in the Land of Moab,) and ſo perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Towne of Eliſha the Prophet: alſo Abel-Vineariim of the Ammonites, whither Iephta purſued them.

†. II.
Of Hazor.

IN this Tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous City of Iabin, in Ioſua's time called Aſor (or after the Chaldean Paraphraſt, Haſzor) by Ioſephus, Aſora; by Iunius, * Chatzor: which Laicſtan names Hefron; the Regall City, and Metropolis of Canaan: ſeated in the Weſt part of Nephta'im, towards Aſher. In this City was that great Rendeuous, and aſſembly of thoſe foure and twenty Kings againſt Ioſua: who being all ouerthrowne, ſlaine, and ſcattered, this their powerfull City was by Ioſua taken and burnt to duſt. But in proceſſe of time the ſame being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a ſecond King Iabin, 137. yeeres after the death of this firſt Iabin, inuaded the Iſraelites: and being ordained of God to puniſh their Idolatry, he preuailed againſt them, and held them in a miſerable ſeruitude twenty yeers: till Debora the Propheteſſe ouerthrew Siſera, Iabins Lieutenant, and his Army, neere the Mountaine Tabor. This City Salomon reſtored at ſuch time as hee alſo reedified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Ægypt, with a Megigdo, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260. yeeres after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalaſar, King of the Aſſyrians. It is now, ſaith Adrichomius, called Antiopia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. There is another City of this name in the Territory of Beniamin, ſeated on the confines of Aſcalon, called the new Hazor, b ſaith Hierome.

* Of two other Cities of this name in Iuda, ſee cha. 9. §. 1. Of a fourth in Beniamin, ſee that which follows in this place of a fifth in this Tribe of Nephtalim, called Hen-Chaſſor we reade, Ioſ. 19. 37. to which we may adde Chatſor-Henan, in the vttermoſt North Eaſt of Manaſſe, ouer *Iordan. Of Cæſarea Philippi.

THere was alſo on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned City of Lais, or Laiſch, as Iunius writes it, or Leſchem; which City the children of Dan (being ſtraitned in their Territory vnder Iuda) inuaded and maſtered; and gaue it the name of their owne Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Geneſis the foureteenth, at which place Abraham ſurprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as farre as Sobah, formerly remembred in the diuiſion of Syria, otherwiſe called Sophena. And after the poſſeſſion of the Danites, it had the ioynt name of Leſchem-Dan. Weiſſenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneua Laiſh, Ioſephus, Dana; Beniamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witneſſe Neubrigenſis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monke, and Poſtellus: who alſo taketh this City to be the ſame, which in Mathew the 15. verſe 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place; and in Saint Marke ſpeaking of the ſame ſtory, Dalmanutha. At ſuch time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it ſeemeth that it was either a free City, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or elſe ſubiect vnto the Kings thereof; for it is written in the eighteenth of Iudges, And there was none to helpe, becauſe Lais was farre from Zidon: and they had no buſineſſe with other men, for it was aboue thirty Engliſh miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

Iudg. 18. 27. Ioſ. 19. 47. Iudg. 18. Chap. 8. 10. Verſe 28.

In after-times when theſe Regions became ſubiect to the State of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a Fountaine adioyning ſo called: and therefore Ptolomie calles it Cæſarea Pania. Hegeſippus calles it Parnium, ſaith Weiſſenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy: for in Hegeſippus ſet out by Badius, it is written Paneum without an (R): and at ſuch time as Philip the ſonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod Tetrarch of Galilee, became Gouernour of Traconitis, ſometime Baſan; this City was by him amplified and fortified; and both to giue memory to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Cæſar, he called it * Cæſarea Philippi: and ſo it became the Metropolis, and head City of Traconitis: and one of the firſt Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the ſucceeding age greatly adorned; by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing a Iosephus in the booke of the Iewish warr 18. saith, that Philip the Tetrarch cast chaffe into a Fountaine called Phiala, distant 120. stadia North-east from Cæsarea, which chaffe being carried vnder ground was cast vp againe at Panium or Dan, whereby it is coniectured that the first Spring of Iordan is from this Fountaine called Phiala, from whence Ior and Dan receiue their waters.

nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in Saint Hieromes time the Citizens remembred their former Paneas, and so recalled it, with the Territory adioyning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloudy issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, as shee was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods goodnesse, and no lesse gratefull for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as neere as it could be moulded: the other made like her selfe, kneeling at his feete, and holding vp her hands towards him. These shee mounted vpon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same Metall, which shee placed by a Fountaine neere her owne House: both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, euen to his owne time: which himselfe had seene, who liued in the Reigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeere after Christ 363. that Monster Iulian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast downe, and defaced: setting vp the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heauen broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth booke, and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was neere the ioyning together of those two Riuers which arising from the springs of Ior and Dan, the two a apparant Fountaines of Iordan: in a soyle exceeding fruitfull, and pleasant; for, as it is written, Iudges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the fields belonging to this City it was that Saint Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram, &c. After this City receiued the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: vnder Fulch the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfry of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them againe it was recouered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the World subiected to the Turke.

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capharnaum is not the least: so often remembred by the Euangelists. This City had the honour of Christs presence three yeeres: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the Doctrine of our salnation: according to that notable Prophecy of Esay 9. The people that walked in darknesse, haue seene a great light: they that dwelt in the Land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.

Capharnaum was seated on Iordan, euen where it entreth into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich soyle: of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophecied in these words. And thou Capharnaum which art lifted vp vnto heauen, shalt be brought downe to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatnesse of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth: it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Brochard, Breidenbech, and Saliniac affirme, that it then consisted but of six poore Fisher-mens houses.

Math. 4. Marke 7. Luke 8. Niger comment. Asia 4. f. 503.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolitana or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in Saint Mathew, Marke and Luke, also remembred; but I find no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Plinie himselfe confesseth; for Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountaine Casius in Cassiotis: and endeth it to the South at Ægypt and Arabia; by which description it imbraceth Phœnicia, a part of Cœlesyria, all Palæstina, and Iudea.

Plin. l. 5. c. 18. Opotes a City standing in the Valley of Cœlesyria, watered by Chrysorroas, as Damascus is. Plin. l. 5. c. 18.

Plinie also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, hee numbreth foure of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opotes, Raphana, then Philadelphia (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as I ghesse Amona rather, because it was the chiefe City of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbath, before Ptolo. Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, sometime ſometime Niſa, built (as is ſaide) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nurſe, who died therein, anciently knowne by the name of Bethſan; for the ſixth he ſetteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœleſyria, which was alſo called Antioch and Seleucia:) but it is Gadara in Baſan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, ſeated on an high hill, neere the Riuer of Hieromaix. This Riuer Ortelius takes to be the Riuer Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manaſſeh ouer Iordan: but he miſtaketh it, for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betweene Hippos and Geraſa, whereas Iaboc entreth the ſame Sea betweene Ephron and Phanuel. For the ſeuenth he nameth * Hippos, or Hippion, a City ſo called of a Colonie of Horſemen there garriſond by Herod, on the Eaſt-ſide of the Galilean Sea, deſcribed hereafter in the Tribe of Manaſſe ouer Iordan. For the eighth Pella, which is alſo called Butis, and Berenice, ſeated in the South border of the Region ouer Iordan, called Perea. For the ninth Gelaſa, which Ioſephus takes to be Geraſa: and Geraſa is found in Cœleſyria by Ioſephus, Hegeſippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phœnicia. The tenth and laſt, Plinie nameth Canatha, and ſo doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calles Gamala, but Hegeſippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Baſan ouer Iordan, ſo called, becauſe thoſe two Hilles on which it is ſeated, haue the ſhape of a Camell. But the collection of theſe ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saligniac, which makes them to be theſe; Cæſarea Philippi, and Aſor, before remembred, Cedes Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capharnaum, Bethſaida, Iotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethſan. For all other Authours diſagree herein, and giue no reaſon for their opinion. One place of the Euangeliſt Saint Mathew makes it manifeſt, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract betweene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coaſts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the middeſt of the coaſts of Decapolis: ſo that it was bounded by Damaſcus and Libanus on the North: by the Phœnician Sea, betweene Zidon and Ptolomais on the Weſt: by the Hilles of Gelbo and Bethſan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracones, otherwiſe Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the Eaſt: which is from Eaſt to Weſt the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neere the ſame diſtance which may be each way forty Engliſh miles.

* Plinie hath Hippon Dion, for which Volaterran reads Hippidion, Ortelius takes them for two Cities.

†. V.
Of Hamath.

BVt to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is ſeated neere the foote thereof the City of * Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they ſay) the Countrey adioyning taketh name; the ſame which Ioſephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathenſis: a Iacobus Zeigler, Iturea. Iturea Regio tenet borealia tribus Nephthali, per montem Libanum vſq; Trachones. The Countrey of Iturea, ſaith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephthali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calles Trachonitis Iturea, he miſtakes the ſeate of this Region: and ſo doth Mercator. For indeede were Iturea (which Hegeſippus calles Perea, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the ſame with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it ſelfe is farre more to the Eaſt than Hammath in Nephtalim: for Traconitis lieth betweene Cæſarea Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones: which the Hebrewes call Gilead: and this Hammath or Chammath is ſeated vnder Cæſarea, towards the Sea Weſt-ward. And it ſeemeth that this miſtaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Cœleſyria, beyond the Mountaines Trachones, which [b] Hierome vpon Amos calles Antiochia, with Hammath or Hamath the leſſer in Phœnicia, and Nephtalim, which he calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our Tranſlation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is ſet farre from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembred in Numbers 34. verſe 8. and Numbers 13. ver. 22. and in Ezekiel 47. 16. In the firſt of which places it bordereth the Land of promiſe, theſe being the words: From Mount Hor you ſhall point (that is, direct or draw a line) vntill it come to Hamath: In

* The Septuagint write it Ammath, Hierome Emath, Ioſephus Amath: Ioſ. c. 19. v. 35. Chammath, c. 21 v. 32: Chammath-Dor, in the firſt of Chron. 6. 76. Chammon, 2 Kin. 14. 8. Chammath-Iehuda, as Iunius reades it, whereas alſo for further diſtinction there is added (in Iſrael) to note that it was of old belonging to Iuda, though ſeated in Iſrael, that is, in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes, the other Chamath, being in Syria Soba. a Zeigler. in Nepta.

b So Hierome in his Cechmani in Amos, c. 6 v. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it ſeemes, for diſtinction from the other in Nephthalim, though Matt. Beroaldus reiecting Hierome, rather follow the opinion of Zeigler aboue mentioned, as indeede it cannot eaſily be iuſtified, that either one or other of theſe is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the ſame City which Ioſua 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephthalim, was alſo called Chamath (whence the word Hamath & Emath, were framed) it may be gathered partly becauſe the other Hamath 2 Chron. 8. 3. for diſtinction is called Chamath Tſoba, as this (as it may ſeeme by Ioſ. 21. 32.) was Chamath Dor- and Chamath Iuda, as we haue noted, 2 Reg 24. Secondly, because Num. 34.8. and also Ezekiel 47.20. Chamath in the North side of the holy Land, is placed too neere the West comer, to be that Chamath-Tsoba: for in the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Moses to name neuer a place Eastward along all the breadth of the holy Land, vntill we come to Hermon (for so they expound Mount Hor, Num.34.7.) and beyond Hermon Eastward in this North side, they make him to name diuers Townes, first Chamath, then Tsedad, then Ziphron, and lastly, Chatsar-henan, a thing most vnlikely: seeing Israel had little or nothing Eastward beyond Hermon. Therefore we must needes expound Hor to be one of the Hilles neere Sidon, and so those Townes, as they are named to lie in order on the North side of Asher, Nephthalim, and Manasses: and in like manner those in Ezekiel: first, Cheelon, then Chamath, and so in order, Berotha, Sibraim, Tsedad, Chauran, Chatsar-henan. c Of which Ios.19. 35. d Which Rehob, or Reehob, in Iosua 19. 28. is placed in Asher towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephthalim.

the second place thus: So they went vp, and searched out the Land from the Wildernesse of Sin, vnto Rehob to goe to Hamath: Then in Ezekiel: The west part also shall be the great Sea from the border, till a man come ouer against Hamath: that is, the coast of the Sea shall bee the West border from the Southermost part of the holy Land, till you come directly ouer against Hamath Northward: from whence if a line be drawne to the Sea, it will touch the walles of Zidon: which is c the Northwest corner of the holy Land. Now that this Hamath or Hammath, which Moses also made the confine of the holy Land, is that of Nephthalim, both the reference which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of d Rehob adioyning prooue it: the other Hamath or Emath (being farre remoued and beyond the forenamed mountaines, which inclose all those Lands which Israel euer had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Iturea, witnesse e Stella and Laicstan; and not that in Nephtalim, where f Ionathas Macchabæus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and remoued by night.

e Tilemanus, Stella and Peter Laicstan, in their Tables of the holy Land.

f Ioseph. Ant: 13.8.

For though Traconitis be comprehended within Iturea (and therefore it is saide to be finimita Galilææ Gentium) yet it hath beginning ouer the mountaines Traconis, and so it stretcheth into the plaines of the Territory of Iturea; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch or President both of Iturea and Trachonitis: both which are ouer Iordan towards the East. But Chamath in Nephtalim, is on the West side of Iordan towards the Mediterran Sea.

The Countrey Iturea was so called of Iethur one of the sonnes of Ismael, it is placed in the bounds of Cœlesyria and Arabia * the Desart.

* That it doth properly belõg to Arabia, the name of Ietur Ismaels sonne, whose issue setled in the Arabiaes, may in part giue witnesse. Also the place of the 1 Chro. 5. 19. confirmes it where Ietur is named among the Hagarens, against whom the Rubenites & Gadites made war, & whose countrey they possest in the time of Ieroboam, as their fore-fathers had done in the time of Saul after his conquest of the Amalekites, Chro.1. ca :5. ver.10. where the country is placed at the East of Gilead.

The people Ituræi were valiant and warlike men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Virgil:

Ituræos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Iturœans bowes were made.

This City Chamath or Hamath in Nephtalim seemes to haue beene as ancient as the other in Iturea, both built by Amatheus the eleuenth son of Canaan. Whether in the time of Dauid, this, or the other had Tohu for King, it is not certaine; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountaines, and Hammath in Nephtalim, were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subiugation Tohu reioyced, because Hadadeser whom the Damascens came to helpe, was his enemy. This Tohu fearing the strength and prosperity of Dauid, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of gold, siluer, and brasse.

But it seemeth that Dauid in such great successe would not haue had peace with Tohu, if he had beene King of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tsoba: which City Salomon after his Fathers death made himselfe Master of, as a part of the lands (* in the larger and conditionall promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

* Of the larger promise expreth Deut. 1.7. where Euphrates is named for one of the bounds: see cap:7. §.2. Hieron. de Locis Hebr.

But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being, as it hath beene saide, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a City well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greekes by Epiphania.

†. VI.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and diuers other Townes.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath towards Iordan standeth the Citie Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountaine Daphnis; which falleth into the lake of Merom. Hereunto was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Iericho: and deliuered to Nabuchodonosor: who to be auenged of Zedekia's infidelity, beyond the proportion of pietie, first caused the Princes his children to be slaine in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that euer he should behold in this world, and so the most remembred, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in yron chaines, he was led a slaue to Babylon, in which estate he ended his life. Hierem. 52. 11. &c. Of which seldome-exempled calamitie, though not in expresse words, Hieremie the Prophet fore-told him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezechiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, I will bring him to Babel to the Land of the Chaldeans, yet shall he not see it, though he shall die therein. Ezek. 12. 13.

was

There are besides these before remembred, many other strong Cities in Nephthalim, as that which is called [a] Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in [b] Isachar, another in Iuda, of which Ios. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is knowne by the addition of [c] Nephtalim, as Iudg. 4. It is seated on a high hill, whence Ios. 20. 7. Kedesh in Galilea in monte Nephtali: Iosephus calls it Cedesis, and in Saint Hieroms time it was called Cidissus. Belforest greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desart of Pharan.

a Or Kedesh, Ios. 19. 37. & 20. 7. & 21. 32. item Iud. 4. 6.

c Sometime Kedesh in Galilea, 1. Chron. 6. 76: Ios 12. 22. 2. Reg: 15 29. () See in Beniamin, and in Ephraim.

After the King thereof among other of the Canaanites perished by the hand of Iosua, it was made a Citie of refuge, and giuen to the Leuites. Herein was Barac borne; who ouerthrew the Armie of the second Iabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possest by Teglatphalasser, when he wasted all Nephtalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: When it had imbraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turkes, and by them it was demolished.

* Other Cities there were of this name, (which is as much as domus solis) as that in Iuda, 2 Kin. 14 15. where Iasso King of the ten tribes ouercame Amasia of Iuda, of which also I vnderstand the place, Ios. 21. 16. & 1 Sam. 6. 14. & 2. Chro. 29. 18. A third as it seemes was in Dan. 1. Kin 4. 9. which Ios. 19. 41 is written Hirshemes, which is as much as Ciuitas solis.

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeeres the inexpugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritimate neere it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated North-ward neere Sephet: this is to be noted; that there are () diuers places of this name in Palestine, all situate on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebrais excelsum; Ramah with the Hebrewes is high.) Also that from this Rama Ios. 19. 36. they reade Arama, making the article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Towns) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the West they place * Beth semes, of which Ios. 19. 38. which defended it selfe against Nephtalim, Iud. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephtalims.

d So it appeares by comparing of the places. Ios 21. 32. and 1. Chr. 6. 76.

Adioyning to which standeth Carthan [d] or Kiriathaim a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountaine out of which the springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi: a place by our Sauiour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the [e] Euangelists.

Adrichomius both here and elsewhere deceiued by the double name, makes two of one: although I deny not but that there was another Kiriathaim in Reuben, of which Ios. 13. 19.

e Mark 3. Math. 10. Acts 1. Math. 5. 6. 7.

Adioyning to these are Magdalel, a place of strength, [f] and Mesaloth, of which we reade that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the [g] Machabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothaes of Nephtalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, [h] one neere Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (vpon a weake coniecture out of Ioseph. ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neere the waters of Merom; because the Kings that ioyned with Iabin against Iosua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Ios. 11. 5. are by Iosephus said to haue incamped at the Citie Beroth in Galilee, not farre from Cedesa superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Beroth of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the vpper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim neere Abela (of which Avela or Abel-beth Mahacah we haue spoken alreadie) this he doth vpon a coniecture touching the place 2. Sam. 20. 14. where some reade Abel & Beth-mahacah, & omnis loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berei: for Sheba being of Beniamin (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Beroth or Beeroth) drew the men of that Citie after him.

Exek. 47. and Aroseth gentium, neere the waters of Merom or Samochonitis, the Citie of Sisara Lieutenant of the Armie of the second Iabin: from whence not farre off towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrehi, a strong Citie: besides many others, whereof I find no particular storie of importance: as Ser in Iosua c. 19. v. 35, called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Assedim & Ser. Then Adama which they call Edama: also Hion which they call Ahion, of which in the Bookes of Kings. Then the strong Citie of Cinnereth after called Gennezareth, whence we reade of the Land and Lake of Gennezareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberias. In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which * Mac. 1. 9. 2. also diuers others named, Ios. 19. as Vcuca or Chukkok: Horem and Azanoth-tabor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Iosua, Iirzon, Lakkum Iepnael, Heleb, and[k] Reccath, which two last they place neere Cæsarea Philippi: To these they adde out of Iosua, Nekeb, and Adami: for which two Iunius readeth Fossa Adamei, making it no Towne but a Ditch cast by some of Adameth, as it seemes; or at least the custodie of which March or Limit belonging to the Towne. To these out of Num. 34. 10. they adde Sephana, which 1. Sam. 30. 21. seemes to be called Sipmoth. As for Tichon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. 47. 16. and the later out of Iosua 19. 33. it may appeare by Iunius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former hee readeth Mediana, and for the latter Quercetum. The Citie of [l] Nephthalim which they make the native place of Tobie, and Naasson neere vnto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar Translation, Tob. 7. 7. but in the Greeke Text there is no signe, neither of the one nor of the other.

Marc. 6. 53. Luc 5. 1.

* This place of the Macchab. warrants no Galgala or Gilgal in Nepthali, but may well be vnderstood of Gilgel in Benia-min or in Manasse.

k This Reccath or Racath Iunius thinkes that it is the same with Karthan (one of these being made of the other by Transposition of letters) of which Karthan wee haue noted already, that it is also called Kiria-thaim.

l In the place, 1 Reg. 4. is, which also they bring to proue that there was a Citie called Nepthalim, as it is euident by the following Verses: the Tribe of Nephthalim is meant, and not any Citie of that name.

§. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABVLON.

OF Zabulon or Zebulon, another of the sonnes of Iacob by Lea, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 57400. able men, besides women, children, and aged vnable persons: all which dying in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to beare armes: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the Riuer Chison: Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

* Iosua 19. 22
a Ios. 2 bel. 19
b Ios. 2 bel. 22.
c Iud. 12. 12.
d The greater Cana is in the Tribe of Asser. Ios. 21. 2. Nathaniel is said to bee of Cana in Galilee. Of Simon it may be doubted: for Angelus Caninius reads Mat. 10. 4. Simon Kanites, which word Luc. 6. is, hee thinketh, to be expounded by Zelotes.
e The Hebrew Hammerchoar, (for which the Vulgar hath Amthar, Ios. 19. 13.) Pagninus expounds qua gyrat; Iunius ioynes it with the word going before it, and reads Rimmonemmō Methoarō, Matt. 8. 11. Marke 1. 6. Luke 4. 10.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the Sea shore, of which Ioseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbaset of * which Ios. 19. 11. Iekonam or Ibneham (whose King was [a] slaine by Iosua, and the Citie was giuen to the Leuites) and Gaba after called the Citie of Horsemen, of a Regiment there garrisond by Herode. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the Citie of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, [b] burnt to the ground by Cestius, Lieutenant of the Romane Armie. Adrichomius makes it the birth Citie of [c] Elon Iudge of Israel, because hee is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Aialon.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Cateth, of which Ios. 19. 15. on the border of Asher: and beyond it the lesser [d] Cana of Galilee, where Christ conuerted Water into Wine: the native Citie of Nathaniel, and as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountaines of Zabulon: and then the Citie of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghitron) which defended it selfe against Zabulon. Then Bersabe which standeth in the partition of the vpper and nether Galilee, fortified by Iosephus against the Romanes. Not farre from hence standeth Shimron of Meron whose King was slaine by Iosua.

Then Damna or Dimna, a Citie of the Leuites: then Noa or rather Neha, of which Ios. 19. 13. Then Dothan or Dothain, where Ioseph found his brethren feeding their flockes: the same wherein Elizeus besieged by the Syrians, strooke them all blinde.

Beyond it towards the East they imagine [e] Amthar or Amathar: then Remmon of the Leuites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native Citie of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did manie miracles, but these people being no lesse incredulous then the Capharnaites, and others, thers, receiued the same Curse of threatened Miseries, as Woe bee vnto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Marie Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated Citie of Iotapata: fortified by Iosephus in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long siege surprised by Vespasian, who slaughtered many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Iosephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that * Sea and the Lake of Genezareth within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name and was called the Sea of the Citie Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Cæsar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Sauiour called Matthew, from the toll or custome house, to be an Apostle, and neere vnto it raised the daughter of Iairus from death: it was built (as Iosephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reigne of Tiberius Cæsar: in the most fruitfull part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchers: Quum iuxta nostras leges (saith hee) ad septem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; where as by our law hee should be seuen daies held as vncleane, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Iosephus it appeares, that this Tiberias is not (as some haue thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephtalim.

* The names of the chiefe Cities seated about this Sea, or lake, throgh which Iordan runneth, where Capernaum, Tiberias, Bethsaida, Gadara, Tarichea, and they adde Cinnereth, which in foretimes gaue name to the Lake and Countrie. Math. 5. Luc. 5. Ioseph. Ant. 18. 3. Ioseph. 10. 15. Adrich. in Zab.

Neere vnto this Tiberias, at Emaus, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias: More into the Land toward the South-west is Bethulia, seated on a very high Hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holofernes and Iudith, such as it is. Neere which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adioyning vnto it, Capharath fortified by Iosephus against the Romans: and Iapha an exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in furie slew 15000. of the Citizens; and caried away aboue two thousand prisoners. Ioseph. in vit. sua. Iosep. 2 Bel 25.

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Leuites, and Gabara, of which Iosephus in his owne life, then Iasie according to Adrichomius (of which Ios. 19. 12.) for hee thinkes that it is not that Iapha of which wee spake but now out of Iosephus. Iideala of which Ios. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Iadela: vnder it Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishops seate) and the Citie Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembred Iudith 7. 3. otherwise Chelma. Betweene Legio and Nazeret is the Citie Saffa or Saffra, the birth-Citie of Zebedaus, Alphæus, Iames and Iohn: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Iosephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus and Hierome, was called Diocæsarea; the Citie of Ioachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary; it was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Iosephus speakes, made the head and defence of Galilee; in another place he saith, Vrbium Galilearum maxima Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Vespasian ere he wanne it. Herod Antipas when he made it the Regall seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperiall, saith Iosephus; and it is now but a Castle called Zaphet. Iosua 21. 35. otherwise Kesloth Thabor, as Iunius thinkes vpon Ios. 19. 12. whence 1 Chro. 6. 77. it is called Thaber. Iohan de Monteuilla, c. 4. & 20.

To the South-West of this Sephoris or Diocæsarea was that blessed place of Nazareth, the Citie of Marie the Mother of Christ; in which hee himselfe was conceiued; it standeth betweene Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Citie hee abode chiefly foure and twenty yeeres, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Christians afterward were for many yeers. It was erected into an Archbishopricke in the following age. Neere vnto it are the Cities Buria (afterward well defended against the Turkes) and Nahalal, of which Ios. 19. 15. and Iud. 1. 30. where it is called Nahalal: and Ios. 21. 35. where it is a Citie of the Leuites, neere the Sea; adioyning to the Riuer of Chison is Sarid, noted in Iosua for the vttermost of Zabulon. Iosep. ant. 18 3. & in vita sua.

In this Territorie of Zabulon there are diuers small Mountaines: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the Apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, Iames, and Iohn: vnto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memorie whereof on the top of the Mountaine, the Empresse Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

The chiefe Riuer of Zabulon is Chison, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one streame.

streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another streame Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Chison where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Cadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorseus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorseus by Cæsaria Palestinæ. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a riuer rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Iordanis parnus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephthael, which Iosua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

See Laicstams Map in Ortelius.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

THE next adioyning Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the neather Galilee, within Iordan: of whom there were increased in Ægypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entred the Holy Land, 64300.

Tarichea in Sueton.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English mile, or somewhat more; a Citie wherein the Iewes (by the practice of a certaine mutinous vpstart, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Gouernour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Iewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian, who entred it by the Sea side, hauing first beaten the Iewes in a sea-fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee; he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the riuers of bloud running through euery street, he reserued the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cession, or Cishion, of the Leuites, and then Isachar, remembred in the first of Kings c.4.v. 17. then Abes or Ebets, Ios. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Ios. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Ios. 21. 29. this also was a City of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboe take beginning: and range themselues to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezrel, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpasses, according to Zeigler; and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, neere which Saul slew himselfe: vnder those, Aphec or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betweene which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, & afterward against Saul: a Land thirstie of bloud, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, incountered Achab: and were ouerthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answere, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell, Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harneis boast himselfe, as he that putteth it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. In the yeere following, in the fields, as they say, adioyning to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian vtterly broken and discomfited by Acab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites or Syrians slaine: before which ouerthrow the seruants and Counsailors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines, they should ouercome them.

2 Kings 20. 23.

Vnder Aphec towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrelon, in the plaines of Galilee, called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Maggedo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to bee seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Casaloth, of which, 1. Machab. 9. 2. Anem or Hen-Gannim of the Leuites, and Seesima or Shahatsima, the West border of Isachar, of which Ios. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Seacoast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrimes: a strong Castle inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-house and Magasine of the Christians, and built by the Earle of S. Giles or Tolouse.

Ios. 21. 29.

From the Castle of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermost farthermost shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the Riuer Chison, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuite of his enemies, at leysure, or perchance a-sleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessells of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the bankes of Chison adioyning.

At the foot of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Porsina and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seate. Returning againe frou the Seacoast towards Tiberias by the bankes of Chison, there are found the Citie of Hapharaim or Aphraim, and the Castles of Mezra, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the Riuer Chison: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widdowes onely sonne. Luc. 7.

Then Seon or Shion named Ios. 19. betweene the two Hills of Hermon, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchauntresse that vndertooke to raise vp the body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anaharath and Rabbith named Ios. c. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Dabara as it is named, Ios. 21. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1. Chron. 6. 72. This Citie (which stretcheth it selfe ouer Chison) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Daberath is Arbela situate, neere the Caues of those two Theeues which so greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It ioyneth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Iesrael: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethsan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermon, and the Riuer Chison on the North. In these* plaines Gedeon ouerthrew the Madianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrians and the Tartars against the Saracens.

§. VII.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

THe next Tribe which ioyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Iordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Ioseph, the eleuenth sonne of Iacob. His mother was an Ægyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasses with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Iacob, were by adoption numbred amongst the sonnes of Iacob, and made vp the number of the twelue Patriarkes.

Of Manasse there were increased in Ægypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Deserts, there entred of their issues, 52700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Iordan on the East, and Dora vpon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Iesrael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name; which Solinus confirmes. Afterward when the Scythians inuaded Asia the lesse, and pierst into the South, to the vttermost of Cælosyria, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians giuen by the Greekes. Plin. lib. 5. c. 18

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Iewes to fight against their owne Nation

Nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victorie, they themselues set on the Iewes which serued them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the vtmost towards the South of Cœlesyria: and Strabo ioynes it to Galilee. It is seated betweene Iordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabitena, saith Zeigler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Iesrael neere Iordan: after that, Iordan strengtheneth it selfe againe into a Riuer, leauing the Sea or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding, Montanus describes it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neere Endor, contrarie to Stella, Lateran, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This Citie was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane an enemie, or Beth-san, the house of an enemie.

Iudg 1. Ios 17. Ide Bell. sacr. Ouer the walls of this Bethsan the Philistims hung the bodie of Saul, and his sonnes slaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian Religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocesse, numbred by Tyrius, in his 14. Booke and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later trauailers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that Citie, goodly pillers and other pieces of excellent marble, which witnesse the statelie buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate Village.

Hierō. in Epist. ad Euagr. & in Loc. Hebr. From Bethsan keeping the way by Iordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, doe not finde to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a towne of that name, neere Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13.18. doe not confirme, where the Vulgar readeth transiuitq; in Salem vrbem Sichemorum (for which others reade venit incolumis ad Ciuitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adiectiue) yet the place Iohn 3. 13. where it is said, that Iohn was baptizing in Ænon neere Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not vnlikely that this Salem of which S. Iohn speaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the Tribe of Beniamin, 1. Sam. 9. 4. This word Iunius maketh to bee the plurall of Shuhal: of which wee reade, 1. Sam. 13. 17. forasfor that which is added out of Canticles 6.12. of Shulammitis, as if it had beene as much as a Woman of this Saleim, neere Ænon, it hath no probality.

This City Bezek by the place, Iud. 1. 3. seemeth to haue beene in Iuda. Iosc. ant. 6. c. 5. Sam. 1. c. 11. Not farre from thence where they place Salem, they find Bezech the Citie of Adonibezet, Iosephus calls it Bala, here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Iuda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieue Iabesh Gilead, against Naash the Ammonite: who would giue them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neere Bezech is the Citie of Bethbera or rather Beth-bara, of which Iudg. 7. 24. in the storie of Gideon: and then Ephra or Hophra, wherein Gedeon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which hee pulled downe and defaced; and neere it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers: a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turke to this day; and not farre hence, betweene the Village of Asophon and Iordan, Ptolomeus Lathurus ouerthrew Alexander King of the Iewes, and slaughtered as Iosephus numbreth them 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomie past by the Villages of the Iewes; he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great caldrons, that the rest of the Iewes might thereby thinke that the Ægyptians were growne to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terror.

Ios l. 13. c. 21. ant.

* This Aner Iunius vpon 1. Chron. 6. 70. makes to bee the same with Tahanac, of which Ios. 21: 25. Hierome names it from Aner the Confederate of Abraham, Gen. 14. 13 Iosua 21. 17. 1 King. 14. Towards the West and on the border of Isachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Leuites, and Abel-Mehola, which Iunius, Iudg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim, it was the habitation of Helisæus the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1. Reg. 4. 12. which were giuen in charge to Baana by Salomon, to whose charge also Tahanac belonging, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Iosua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their Citie giuen to the Leuites.

In the bodie of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat neerer Iordan, than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Iosua slew: which the Kings of Israel vsed for their Regall seate, till such time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Ieroboam went to Achia to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sonnes death.

The second was Thebes neere Samaria, of which name there are both in Ægypt, and Greece, Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Towne, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelec was wounded by a waighty stone, throwne by a Woman ouer the Wall, who despairing of his recouery, commanded his Page to slay him outright, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others set this Citie in Ephraim neere Sichem or Neapolis. Iudg. 9. v. 54.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adioyning is called Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies or Gouernments in Iudea) for which Hierome, 1. Macc. 5. reades Arabathena: but in the Greeke it is Acrabatine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This Citie had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine belonging to the Gouernour thereof. Iosephus remembreth it often, as in his second Booke of the Iewes Warres, c. 11. 25. 28. & elsewhere. Hier. Mac. 1. c. 5.

The difference betweene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Prouince, and the other for a Citie with some lesser Territory adioyning, and a Tetrarch is the same with Prases in Latine, and President in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdome: and thereof so called: Plinie nameth seuenteen Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had foure, and so hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Lemster, Vlster, Connath, and Mounster. Plin. l. 5. Euseb. in Chrō

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam or Bilham, & Gethremmon of the Leuites: but Iunius out of Ios. 21. 25. and 1. Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one: and that Ibleham Ios. 16. 11. is another name of the same Citie.

Then is Iesrael a Regall Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Iezabel by a false accusation caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end she might possesse his Vineyard adioyning to the Citie, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his Father.

Ioram also was cast vnburied into the same field: for which his Mother Iezabel murthered Naboth. King. 2. cap. 2.

Toward the Sea from Iesrael is the Citie which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Ahaziah King of Iuda fled from Iehu, when he had slaine Ioram, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Maggeddo adioyning. The Scripture calls this Citie of Gaber, Gur. 2. Kin. 9. 27.

Then Adadremmon, neere vnto which the good King Iosias was slaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a War vnaduisedly vndertaken. For Necho marched towards Assyria against the King thereof; by the commandement of God: whom Iosias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbor Citie to Adadremmon was Maggeddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whose King was slaine among the rest by Iosua: yet they defended their Citie for a long time against Manasse. The Riuer which passeth by the Towne, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorseus: and not that of which we haue spokon in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that haue described the Holy Land, delineate no such Riuer. Moore onely sets it downe in his Geographie of the twelue Tribes: but the Riuer which passeth by Maggeddo, he vnderstandeth to be but a branch, falling thereinto. Laiestan and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Iudges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tenaac by the waters of Maggeddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, giue it no other name then the Torrent so called. Iud. ca. 5. Ios 12. 21.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia, euen to Sebaste or Samaria; and Strabo farre beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Iosephus calls Cæsaria Palestina a Citie of Phœnicia, yea Laurentius Coruinus extendeth Phœnicia as farre as Geza: seeing also Ptolomie sets downe Chorseus for the partition of Phœnicia and Iudea: this Riuer running East and West paralell with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomie in his fourth Table of Asia calleth Chorseus. The later trauailers of the holy Land call Maggedda Subimbre at this day. Strab. l. 16. Iosep. l. 15. c. 13 Niger.

†. II.

Of Cæsaria Palestina, and some other Townes.

FRom Maggeddo toward the West, and neere the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Cæsaria Palestine: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Plinie calls Apollonia:

Apollonia: though Ptolomie ſets Apollonia elſewhere, & toward Aegypt, betweene this City and Ioppe, to which Veſpaſian gaue the name of Flauia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the workes in that part of the world. For beſides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and poliſht marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke ouer the Seas farre away, with the high and ſtately Towers and Gates: hee forced a Harborow of great capacitie, being in former times but an open Bay: and the winde blowing from the Sea the Marchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the ſtrength of their cables and Anchors. This worke he performed with ſuch charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any age: which, becauſe the Materialls were fetcht from farre, and the waight of the ſtones was ſuch as it exceedeth beliefe, I haue added Ioſephus owne words of this work, which are theſe: Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magnæ claſſi recipiendæ ſufficere: & in viginti vlnarum profundum, prægrandia ſaxa demiſit: quorum pleraq; pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octodecim, altitudine nouem-pedali: fuerunt quædam etiam maiora, minora alia; To mend this inconuenience of place (ſaith Ioſephus) hee compaſt in a Bay wherein a great fleete might well ride: and let downe great ſtones twenty fadome deepe: whereof ſome were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thicke: ſome bigger, and ſome leſſer. To this he added an arme or cawſie of two hundred foote long, to breake the waues: the reſt hee ſtrengthened with a ſtone wall, with diuers ſtately Towers thereon builded: of which the moſt magnificent he called Druſus, after the name of Druſus the ſonne in law of Caſar: in whoſe honour he intituled the Citie it ſelfe, Cæſaria of Paleſtine: all which he performed in twelue yeeres time. It was the firſt of the Eaſterne Cities that receiued a Biſhop: afterward erected into an Archbiſhopricke, commanding twentie others vnder it, ſaith Tyrius.

l. 4. c. 12. bell. ſacr.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Euſebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Gelaſius to haue beene Biſhops thereof. In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apoſtle: S. Paul was heerein two yeres priſoner, vnder the Preſident Fælix, vnto the time and gouernment of Porcius Feſtus: by whom making his appeale, he was ſent to Cæſar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was paſſing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia; taking delight to be called a God by his flatteries, hee was ſtricken with an Angell vnto death, ſaith Ioſephus.

To the North of Cæſaria ſtandeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as ſome reade, Ioſ. 1. 2. ſo called (ſaith Adrichomius) becauſe it ioyneth to the Sea, whoſe King was ſlaine by Ioſua. But Iunius for in Naphoth Dor, reades in tractibus Dor: and ſo the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor; although 1. Reg. 4. 11. for the like ſpeech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Ioſua call it Nepheth-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Ioſ. 12. 23. Iudg. 1. 27.) may ſeeme to be Dor. It was a ſtrong and powerfull Citie, and the fourth in account of thoſe twelue Principalities or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Iunius vpon Macchab. 15. 11. placeth it betweene the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the Riuer Cherſeus: for ſo ſome name the Riuer Chorſeus, of which we haue ſpoken already.

Into this Citie, for the ſtrength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the ſon of Demetrius, where hee was by the ſame Antiochus beſieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. Horſe: the ſame perfidious villain that receiued 200. talents for the ranſome of Ionathas Macchabæus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then ſlew him: and after him ſlew his owne Maſter, vſurping for a while the Kingdome of Syria. It had alſo a Biſhops ſeate of the Dioceſſe of Cæſaria.

Macc. 1 13. 15.

From Ceſaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for beſides that Capharnaum famous in the Euangeliſts, they finde in theſe parts neere the Weſt Sea, another of the ſame name. Of Gabe Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal or Gilgal, was in Beniamin: but this Gilgal, they ſay, it was whoſe King was ſlaine by Ioſua.

Gul. Tyr. de Bell. ſacr. l. 12. c. 6.

Then Antipatris ſo called of Herode, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Macchabees it was called Capharſalama: in the fields whereof Iudas Macchabæus ouerthrew a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an armie drawn into Iudæa by a traiterous Iew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Prieſt-hood, firſt vnder Bacchides, and then vnder Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried priſoner from Hieruſalem, conducted conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Iewes. In after-times the Armie of Godfrey of Bulion attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those daies with a Bishops seate, but it is now a poore Village called Assur, saith Brochard. Neere vnto this Citie the Prophet Ionas was three daies preserued in the bodie of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Romane wasted with fire and sword, because the Iewes which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neere vnto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein hee hid an hundreth Prophets, and fedde them, after which he himselfe is said to haue obtained from God the Spirit of Prophesie also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

§. I.

The bounds and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BEcause these fiue Tribes, of Asser, Nephtalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, possest the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phœnica, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I haue therefore gathered a briefe of those Kings which haue gouerned therein: at least so many of them as time (which deoureth all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest haue perished, it is not strange; seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and reuolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquests of Heathen Princes, haue beene torne, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very vncertaine: but all Cosmographers doe in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casiotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomie makes it a little larger, as reaching from the Riuer Eleutherus, that falls into the Sea at the Iland of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterran sea, as farre as the Riuer of Chorseus, which seemes to be that which the Iewes call the Torrent or Riuer of Mageddo. Plinie extends it farther, and comprehends Ioppe within it: Coruinus and Budæus, Ioppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budæus) quæ nunc Palestina Syriæ dicitur; It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palæstina of Syria. Pto. 4. Tab. Asiæ. Plin. lib. 5. c. 19

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia, all the Sea side of Iudæa, and Palestina, euen vnto Pelusium, the first Port of Ægypt. On the contrary Diodorus Siculus foldeth it vp in Cœlesyria, which hee boundeth not. But for my selfe I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldome deceiued in his owne Art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Ilands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palestine: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea. Strab. l. 16. Buda. de Ass. l. 4

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subiect to that people were called Zidonians: the same state continuing euen vnto Iosuas time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region, afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Vandall warres. But in processe of time the Citie of Tyre adioyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled. Esay 23.

But after the death of Moses, and while Iosua yet gouerned Israel, Agenor an Ægyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons of Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus & Curtius) and built & possest the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second Son) the vse of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuite after his sister Europa taught the Græcians. For Taurus King of Crete, when hee surprised Tyre, had stollen her thence: of which the Poets deuised the fable of Iupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first first King of Phœnicia: and findes Cadmus his successour: whom hee calleth his grandchild: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name alwayes in reuerence, making it apart of their owne, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: which memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses: F. 17.

Hic Regina grauem gemmis auroq; popposcit
Impleuitq; mero pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo soliti.

The Queene anon commands the waighty bowle
(Waightie with precious stones and massie gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus vs'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seemes to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Libya, the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Sonne of Telegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the and of Cecrops time, saith S. Augustine, Moses left Ægypt: Agenors successor liuing at once with Iosua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gaue that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in stead of the building of Tyre, and Zidon, it is probable that hee repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought vp in Ægypt: where he learnt the vse of letters (Ægypt flourishing in all kinde of learning in Moses time,) or were he by Nation an Ægyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to saue his own Territory: or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Ægypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Iosua conducted ouer Iordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Ægyptians, by reason of the losse which they receiued by the hand of God, in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrewes from inuading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Emorites and Ammonites their borderers: yet Ægypt hauing such Vessels, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in vse: did not in all probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or assist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistims which held the shores of Canaan, next adioyning vnto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to haue built (that is, to haue fortified and defended against Iosua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Iosua called the strong Citie, Accho afterward Ptolomais, Aczib and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those dayes. C. 19 v. 29.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appeares, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that Dauid and Salomon could not master them: but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it selfe 13 yeers against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the prouidence of God, seemed vnresistable) spent more time in the recouery of Tyre, than in the cõquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Iosephus, who conceiues that Tyre was founded by Tyras the sonne of Iaphet. And for the Region it selfe, though Calisthenes deriue it ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greekes from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts, yet for my selfe I take it that Phœnix the sonne of Agenor gaue it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his sonne in Greece, were the Inuentors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute vnnecessary.

The Æthiopians affirme, that Atlas, Orion, Orphens, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and ciuill Policies, which they afterward profest, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Libyans: to wit, from the South and Superior Ægyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Diuinitie and Philosophie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, receiued Ciuilitie. Againe, the Phœnicians challenge this inuention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Ægyptians at all; neither doe they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Affricans; whence Lucan.

Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.

Phœnicians first (if fame may credit haue)
In rude Characters dar'd our wordes to graue.

And that Cadmus was the sonne of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Ægyptian, it appeareth by that answere made by Zeno; when he in a kinde of reproach was called a stranger and a Phœnician:

Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipse Athen. 1. Dipnos.
Phœnix; cui debet Græcia docta libros.

If a Phœnician borne I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Bookes of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Iosephus the Historian confirmes a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians againe subscribe to none of these reports: but affirme constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them when Atlas liued in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Ægypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French doe not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gaules taught the Greekes the vse of Letters, and other Sciences. And doe not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as those Gaules, and that they sent their sonnes hither to be by them instructed in all kinde of learning? Iosephus contra Appionem.

Lastly, whereas others bestow this inuention on Moses, the same hath no probabilitie at all, for he liued at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Ægypt, and Assyria, and hee himselfe was brought vp in all the learning of the Ægyptians, from his infancie.

But true it is, that letters were inuented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the generall floud: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knowes; from whom all wisedome and vnderstanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he giuen the same inuention to diuers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for euen in Mexico, when it was first discouered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hierogliphicks, anciently vsed by the Ægyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldrie; and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutchions, like vnto those vsed by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations. Iura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Naturall Lawes are common and generall. Iurisconsul.

§. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

BVt whatsoeuer remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the bookes of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Mnaseas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to bee gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor liued at once with Iosua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Græcians besieged Troy, Phasis gouerned Phœnicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Iehoiakim ruled in Iuda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of seuerall Kings. Chap. 27. v. 3.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee inuaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, & Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirme, Xerxes fleete, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and pettie Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiected by Nabuchodonozor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophecied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependancie vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Græcians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betweene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeeres and somewhat more between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more vnworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) he rather submitted himselfe by the instigation of his Subiects (who foresaw their vtter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians. L. 4.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill liuing: and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women-dancers, and singers: whom hee to this end chiefly inuited, and assembled: that hauing beheld the most beautifull and liuely among them, he might recouer them for his owne vse and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Persians were neer him with an Armie too waighty for his strength, & finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians: he determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done, shee also therewith pierced her owne bodie, and died. Athē. l. 12. c. 13. Hieron. l. 1. cont. Iouin.

After Alexander was possest of Zidon, and the other Strato driuen thence, He gaue the Kingdome to Hephæstion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the bloud and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdoleminus, Iustine Abdolomius, and Plutarch Alynomus: who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting hearbs and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wise man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subiected to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is saide, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be begathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians, but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesius, doe in no sort agree in the times of their raignes; nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Iosephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abelmalus: the same perchance that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourtie and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians. Cap. 46.

To this Abibalus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. Dauid (saith Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also Dauid complaineth, Psal. 83. Præp. Euang. l. 9. c. 4.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Iosephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometime Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entred into a league with Dauid, and sent him Cedars with Masons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Hierusalem: after he had beaten thence the Iebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not onely furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of mony, but also he ioyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Nauigators: & lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not onely mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 3d booke, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greekes: and in Zonaras Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, hee despised the 20. Townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King Dauid: & gaue his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Astaroth, the Idoll of the Phœnitians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres. 2. Sam. 5. &c. 2. Sam. c. 5. 1. Kin. c. 1. 9. 20. 1. Chron. 14. 2. Chron. 2. 8. 9. 1. King 11.

Baleastartus whom Theoph. Antiochenus, calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeeres according to Iosephus. Theoph. 17. yeeres.

Abdastartus the eldest sonne of Baleastartus, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 20. yeeres according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus hee reigned 12. yeere, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurse, the eldest of them held the Kingdome 12. yeeres.

Astartus brother to Abdastartus, recouered the Kingdom from this Vsurper, and reigned 12. yeeres.

Astarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Astartus, and ruled 9. yeeres, and liued in all 54. Ioseph. 54. Theoph. 58.

Phelles the fourth sonne of Baleastartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Astarimus, and reigned 8. moneths; liued 50. yeares. Theoph.

Ithobalus (or Iuthobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astarimus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddesse Astarta, which was a dignity next vnto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Vnckle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeeres, the same which in the first Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Iezabel, Achab married. Ioseph. 32. Theoph. 12.

Badezor or Bazor the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabell, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45. 1. King. 16. 31. Ioseph 6 yeeres. Theoph. 26.

Mettimus succeded Badezor, & reigned but 9. yeeres (saith Iosephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca; and two daughters Elisa and Anna. Ioseph. 9. Theoph. 29.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56. In the seuenth yeere of whose reigne, Elisa sailed into Affrica, and built Carthage, 143. yeeres and 8. moneths, after the Temple of Salomon: which by our accompt was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion couetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleeue Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be despoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Affrica, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barcæ in Affrica, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hannibal. Seruius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts; others from Didida, a surname of Salomon. Iustin. l. 18. Virgil. l. 1.

Eluleus

Elulæus succeeded Pygmalion: and reigned 36. yeeres: the same that ouerthrew the fleet of Salmanassar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which, he continued his siege before it on the Land side fiue yeeres, but in vaine.

After Elulæus, Ethobales gouerned the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre, 13. yeeres together, ere he preuailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeeres a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was gouerned by diuers Iudges, succeeding each other: First, by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Geraſtus, who held it among them some 7. years, and odde months: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeere: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4. yeeres: after him Irom sent thence also, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whose reigne Cyrus beganne to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozeus his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them receiued and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Tract at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who onely is vnchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the sayde Bozius, inforcing heere-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians, were fruites of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumæans, descended from Esau, Iacobs brother: first, it can hardly be beleeued that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in anie sort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the proofe which the Scriptures giue of Hirams good affection when Salomon built the Temple) hee brings many coniecturall arguments; whereof the strongest is their petigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esau receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeuours to shew, partly by weake reasons, painefully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, & others witnesse, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumæans: as Elah and Esiongaber; or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose cheefe City was Madian, so called of Madian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Heereunto he addes, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartù, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselues differed much in their Philosophy from the idolatrous customes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumæans, was an Vniuersity, wherein as may appeare by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.

Boz. de ruin. Gent. l. 5. c. 7.

Such is the discourse of Bozius, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by another, deserues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Esau brought vp his children, it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posterity were Idolaters, is directly proued in the 25. Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetuall enemies to the House of Israel, saue onely when Dauid & some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knowes not? or who is ignorant rant of Dauids vnfriendly behauiour amongſt them, when firſt they were ſubdued? Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betvvene Tyrus & Mount Seir, that Hiram held ſuch good correſpondence with Dauid: euen then when Ioab ſlew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edomites were ſo ill intreated. It ſeemeth that the piety and ancient wiſedome of Eliphaz the Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumæans puniſhed, for being ſuch as Dauid in his owne dayes found them. Although indeede the City of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reaſon with Iob, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the ſame name, lying Eaſt from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hus, the Country of Iob: and to Suah the City of Bildad the Suhite, as both ſuch Chorographers who beſt knew thoſe parts, do plainly ſhew, and the holy Text makes manifeſt. For Iob is ſaid to haue exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wiſedome, all the people of the Eaſt; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Paleſtina. True it is that Eliphaz the ſonne of Eſau had a ſonne called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in thoſe dayes to take name of their ſonnes, I no where finde. And Iſmael alſo had a ſon called Thema: of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the Eaſt had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Iudges, the Midianites, Amalekites, & all they of the Eaſt are called Iſmaelites. And he that wel conſiders how great and ſtrong a Nation Amalec was, which durſt giue battaile to the Hoſt of Iſrael, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleeue that ſuch a people were deſcended from one of Eſau his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberleſſe muſt the forces of all Edom haue beene: if one Tribe of them, yea one Family of a Tribe had beene ſo great? ſurely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec: or aſſiſted the Amalekites: when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it ſelfe, if diſtinct from the Iſmaelites. The like may be ſaid of Midian, that the Founder thereof being ſon to Abraham by Cethura, doubtles was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seigniory of the Red-ſea coaſt, which Bozius imagines the Edumæans to haue held: if the Edomites in after-times held ſome places as Elan and Eſiongaber on the Red Sea ſhore, yet in Moſes time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moſes himſelf ſaith, that Iſrael did compaſſe all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian ſtood, Moſes muſt needs haue known it: becauſe he had ſoiourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Ægypt.

But coniecturall Arguments, how probable ſoeuer, are needleſſe in ſo manifeſt a caſe. For in the 83. Pſal. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as diſtinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors ſhew, and Bozius himſelfe confeſſeth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen.c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue bene deſtroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Aſſer, Ioſ. 29. becauſe they were Idolaters, and of the curſed ſeede of Canaan, not Couſins to Iſrael, nor profeſſors of the ſame Religion. For though Hiram ſaid, Bleſſed bee God that hath ſent King Dauid a wiſe ſonne: we cannot inferre that he was of Dauids Religion. The Turke hath ſayde as much of Chriſtian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worſhipped Aſtaroth; and drew Salomon alſo to the ſame Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, he did it for his owne ends, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouiſion of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly conſider things, it will appeare that Hiram in all points, deale Merchant-like with Salomon, He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-peſtered: being otherwiſe apt to yeelde ſilkes: as the Andarine ſilkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oyle, which he wanted, he gaue that which he could well ſpare to Salomon. Alſo Gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wiſer; who hauing got the gold firſt, gaue to Hiram the worſt Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleaſed. But it was a neceſſary policy which inforced Tyrus to hold league with Iſrael. For Dauid had ſubdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates: thorough which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, to their fleets on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyrus: ſo that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to paſſe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their aduentures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might haue greatly distressed the Tyrians, & perhaps haue brought them euen into subiection. Which Hiram knowing; was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent workes, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ayded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betweene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrians: so those other proofes which Bozius frames negatiuely vpon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knowes. It seemes to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples. Euery saluage Nation hath some wisedome excelleth the Vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisedome of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Vtica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which I thinke, the Ilands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue beene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Salomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozius, who would haue vs thinke them to haue beene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styleth men of contrary opinion, impios politicos, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozius would better haue agreed with Iulian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest vnto the true Religion: what may be saide of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon euery new victory? How few great battailes did the Romanes win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honor to one of their olde Gods? yea, what one Nation, saue onely that of the Iewes, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertaine in their City? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Iewes, they reiected, vpbraiding the Iewes with him, as if he were vnworthy of the Romane Maiesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen writers vsed against the Christians in the Primitiue Church: That such Idolatry had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abhominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozius, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is vsually found among men of his humour; who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainely fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimæra's of Diuinity, condemne all such, in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pitty is it, that such mad dogges are oftentimes incouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselues cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAuing now past ouer Phœnicia, wee come to the next Territorie adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose yssues when they left Aegypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Desarts, (Iosua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to be able men 32500. who sate downe on the West side of Iordan, betweene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Iordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West. Psal. 59. 78. 108. Par. 25.

The first and chiefe Cittie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Amris or Homri King thereof, and seated on the toppe of the Mountaine Somron, which ouer-looketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Seacoast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cæsar. This City is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brochard found greater then those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewne and carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cæsar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Helisæus, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Neere Samaria toward the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine, Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the restauration called Neapolis, now Pelosa, and Napolasa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Leui, in reuenge of the rauishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec euened with the soyle. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Damascens a third time cast it downe. Sichar. Ioh. 4. 5. Maburh. in. Ioseph. 11. ant. 1.

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhathon on the Mountaine Amalec, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Nere to this Citie Iudas Macchabæus ouerthrew Seron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified. Iudg. 12: 15. 2 Kyng. 13.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Ios. 10. And Saron whose King was slaine by Iosua: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cæsarea Palæstinæ, extendeth it selfe, alongst the coast as farre as Ioppe, saith Adrichome. Though indeed the name Sarona is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitfull plaine Region; for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, betweene Cæsarea and Ioppe, but that also betweene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the fiue and thirtieth Chapter of Esay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdia, reade Saron for Assaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine neere Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diospolis, or the City of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudæa, the fift in dignity (or the third after Pliny), where Saint Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) cured Æneas. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Ioppe Sarona. This Ioppe was Ios. c. 12. 18. Act. 9. Luc. 23. Niger. Com. 4. Asia fol 303. 14.

was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, those Rauens and spoylers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, vsurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other respect led than to amplifie their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselues, after murthering one another, became a prey to the most sauage and barbarous Nations.

Of this Saint George see more aboue in this 2. booke. C. 7. §. 3. † 5.

In Dioſpolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Iustinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to be built ouer his Tombe, these be Tyrius his words: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Ioppe, per latè patentem planitiem Elutheriam pertranseuntes, Liddam quæ est Dioſpolis, vbi & egregij Martyris Georgij vsque hodiè Sepulchrum oſtenditur, peruenerunt, eius Eccleſiam quam ad honorem eiusdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Iustinianus multo studio & deuotione prompta ædificari præceperat, &c. They hauing left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatris, and Ioppe, passing ouer the great open plaine of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Dioſpolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the Godly & Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mighty Iustinian had commanded to bee built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus farre Tyrius, by whose testimonie, wee may coniecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulcher stand? occasioned the vprore of the people against him: as fearing lest he would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might haue rescued him: yet hee addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had bene gathered vp, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not Georgius, whose name liues in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius aboue cited, witnesseth to haue bene buried at Lidda or Dioſpolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitriac. S. Hierome affirmes that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan, Salig. Tom 6. c. 4.

Neere to Lidda or Dioſpolis standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramula, the natiue Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Iuda neere Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not far from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adioyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hils of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel liued, and wherein he is buried.

See in the Tribe of Beniamin, cap. 12. §. 1.

Sam. 1. 25. v. 5.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Aialon of the Leuites, of which 1. Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Ioſephus in his Antiquities, and in the war of the Iewes. Also Balsaliſa (for which Iunius, 2. Reg. 4, 42. reades planities Shaliſtæ) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 6. where we reade of the Land of Shaliſha, findeth it in Beniamin.

Ant. 13. 21. de Bell Ind. 1. 6.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Goſna, one of the Toparchies or Cities of gouernment, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Iudg. 2. 9. It is called Thamnath Chores. Ioſ. 19. 50.

Then Thamnath-ſara, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies or Præſidencies of Iudæa, which they call Thampitica; a goodly City and strong, seated on one of the high Hils of Ephraim; on the North of the hill called Gaas; which City and Territory, Israel gaue vnto their Leader Ioſua; who also amplified it with buildings, neere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieroms time, and ouer it the Sunne engrauen, in memory of that greatest of wonders, which God wrought in Ioſuas time.

Hieron. in locis Hebr.

Macca. 1. 7. 40

In the places adioyning standeth Adarſa, or Adaſa; where Iudas Maccabeus with 3000. Iewes ouerthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neere to Gaſer or Gezer which Ioſua tooke, and hung their King; a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharao of Ægypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed; Salomon re-built it.

To

To the East of this place is the Frontier Citie of Iefleti, of which Ioſ. 16.3. otherwiſe Pelethi, whence Dauid had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous Mountaine and Citie of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept ſo many yeeres, till the Philiſtims got it.

To this they ioyne the Citie of Machmas or Michmas: in which Ionathas Maccabæus inhabited, a place often remembred in the Scriptures. It ſtandeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hieruſalem: and is now called Byra. See in Beniamin. Maccab. 1. 9. v. vlt.

Then the Village of Naioth where Saul prophecied; and neere it Ephron, one of thoſe Cities which Abijah recouered from Ieroboam; after the great ouerthrow giuen him. Kin. 1. c. 4. and ſee Rama in Beniamin.

Then Kibtſaim, of the Leuites, of which Ioſua 21.22. which Iunius thinks to be the ſame with Iokmeham, of which 1 Chro. 6.28. As for Abſaloms Baalaſor, which they finde hereabout, Iunius reades it in the Plaine of Chatzor; and findes it in the Tribe of Iuda; as Ioſ. 15. we reade of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one neere Kedeſh, v. 23. and the other the ſame as Chetzron, v. 25.

In this Tribe alſo they finde the Citie of Mello; whoſe Citizens, they ſay, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Baſtard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raiſed a Tribute vpon the people. But it ſeemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a ſtrong Fort or Cittadell: and ſo Iunius for domus Millo, reades incolæ munitionis, and for Salomo ædificabit Millo, he reades ædificabat munitionem, and ſo the Septuagint reade τὸ τεῖχος in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hieruſalem. Iud. 9. verſ. 6. & 20. 1 Reg. 11 27. Vatablus expounds Millo in this place, locum publicum neceſſarium ciuibus Ieroſolymitanis atque Iſraelitis.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whoſe King was ſlaine by Ioſua; and Ianoach or Ianoah ſpoyled by Teglatphalaſſar; Pekah then gouerning Iſrael; with diuers others, but of no great fame. The Mountaines of Ephraim ſometime ſignifie the greateſt part of the Land of the Sonnes of Ioſeph, on the Weſt of Iordan: ſeuerall parts whereof are the Hill of Samron or Samaria, 1 Reg. 16.24. * the Hill of Gahas, Iudg. 2.9. the Hill of Tſalmon or Salmon, Iudg. 9.48. the Hils of the Region of Tſuph or Tſophim, Iudg. 9.5. where Rama-Tſophim ſtood, which was the Citie of Samuel. 2 King. 15 29. Ioſ. 17. v. 15. 16 *Alſo the Hill of Phineas, where Eleazar the high Prieſt the ſon of Aaron, was buried, Ioſ. 24.33. And the two tops of Hils, Gerizzim where the bleſſings, & Hebal where the curſings were to be read to the people: of which Deut. 11. & 27. & Ioſ. 8.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines vpon the ſides of the Mountaines, was the occaſion that Iacob in the Spirit of Prophecie, Gen. 49.22. compared Iolephs two branches, Ephraim and Manaſſe, to the branches of a fruitfull Vine planted by the Well ſide, and ſpreading her Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory alſo Ezekiel, c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the tenne Tribes, whoſe head was Ephraim) proſequutes: as alſo in his Lamentation for Iuda, he followeth the other Allegorie of Iacob, Gen. 49.9. comparing Iuda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the higheſt of theſe Hils of Ephraim, which ouer-looketh all the plaines on both ſides of Iordan, they finde the Caſtle called Dok: which they make to be the ſame with Dagon, of which Ioſeph. 1. Bell. Iudg. c. 2. in which Caſtle as it is, 1 Maco. 16. Ptolomie moſt traiterouſly, at a banquet, ſlew Simon Maccabeus his Father in Law. a It ſeemeth that Iacob in this prophecie the rather vſeth the word Daughters for branches, thereby the more plainly to ſignifie Colonies: which in the Hebrew phraſe are called Daughters of the Metropolis: as in Ioſua and elſewhere often:

Among the Riuers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembred in the ſecond of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Iunius reade Hiddai ex vna vallium Gahaſi: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus reade Giddai of the Riuer of Gaas. Alſo in this Tribe they place the Riuer of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great droughth: where he was [b] fed with the Rauens: and after that the Riuer was dried vp, he trauailed (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieued by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whoſe dead ſonne he reuiued, and increaſed her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby ſhe ſuſtained her life. [b] 1 Reg. 17. 5. 1 Reg. 17.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from Ieroboam to Achab.

OF the firſt Kings of Iſrael, I omit in this place to ſpeake: and reſerue it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Iuda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diuiſion from Iuda and Beniamin, now it followeth to ſpeake. The firſt of theſe Kings Ieroboam, the ſonne of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda, who being a man of ſtrength & courage, was by Salomon made ouer-ſeer of the buildings of the Munition in Hieruſalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim & Manaſſe: & ſo many of them as wrought in thoſe works. During which time as he went from salem, he encountred the Prophet Ahïjah: who made him know that hee was by God destinied to be King of Israel: and to command ten of the twelue Tribes. After this fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Ægypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Osochores, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Idumæan, when he was carried yong into Ægypt from the furie of Dauid, and his Captaine Ioab; which Adad, the King of Ægypt married to his Wiues sister Taphnes; vsing both him and 1 King. 14. Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdome of Iudæa; that himselfe might the easilier spoile it, as he did: for in the fift yeare of Rehoboam, Shishak sackt the Citie of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of Dauid and Salomon, and all the spoiles which Dauid tooke from Adadezer of Soba, with the presents of Tohu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Israelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hierusalem to doe their vsuall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation Ambrose vpon the 1. Chap. of the Epistle to the Romanes. of the Ægyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calfe in Horeb) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and vnlerned people. This King made his chiefe seate and Palace at Sichem: Hee despised the warning of the Iudæan Prophet, whom Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Ioel: his hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatry; and hardned vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahïjah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posterity.

1 King. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. Chron. 13. He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Iuda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second yeere of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and rooted out by Baasha, who raigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

Baasha the sonne of Ahïjah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Asa King of Iuda: he seated himselfe in Therza: and fortified Rama against Iuda, to restraine their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nepthalim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Asa carried away the Materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was 1 King. 15. & 16. threatned by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twenty yeeres and died.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Palace of Therza, was in his cups slaine by Zambris after he had raigned two yeeres: and in him the prophecie of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seauen dayes; But Ambris
1 King. 16. in reuenge of the Kings Murther, set vpon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Therza, and forst him to burne himselfe.

Ambris or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seate from Therza to Samaria:
1 King. 16. which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiected to Tabremmon, King of Syria; the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue; seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was in-
1 King. 15. uited by Asa King of Iuda, to assaile Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris raigned twelue yeeres, fixe in Therza, and fixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

Achab or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not onely vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Ægyptians: but he married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Ægyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian:

nian: and erected an Altar and a Groue to Baal in Samaria. He ſuffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the moſt high God. God ſent famine on the Land of Iſrael. Achab met Elias: Elias preuailed in the triall of the Sacrifice, and killeth the falſe Prophets: and afterward flyeth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, beſieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him ſet at libertie: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michaas) reproueth him: afterward he cauſed Naboth by a falſe accuſation to be ſtoned. Then ioyning with Ioſaphas in the warre for the recouery of Ramoth, he was ſlaine as Michaas had foretold him.

Hee had three ſonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and Ioas: beſides ſeauentie other ſonnes by ſundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias ſucceeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruiſed himſelfe by a fall: and ſent for counſaile to Beel-zebub the God of Acharon. Eliah the Prophet meeteth the meſſenger on the way: and miſliking that Ochozias ſought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the meſſenger, If there were not a God in Iſrael? Ochozias ſendeth two Captaines, and with each fiftie ſouldiers to bring Eliah vnto him, both which with their Attendants were conſumed with fire. The third Captaine beſought mercie at Eliahs hands, and he ſpared him, and went with him to the king; auowing it to the king that he muſt then die, which came to paſſe in the ſecond yeare of his raigne. Beelſebub was the ſame with Belus, and Plutus, ſaith Viginere vpon Liuie. 2 Kings 1.

Ioram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, ſucceeded: He allured Ioſaphat king of Iuda, and the king of Edom to aſſiſt him againſt the Moabites, who refuſed to pay him the tribute of 20000. ſheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themſelues and their Horſes, in the Deſarts. The Prophet Eliſha cauſeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are ouerthrowne: their king flyeth to Kirharaſeth, and being beſieged, according to ſome Expoſitors, burnt his ſonne on the wals as a Sacrifice, whereat the three kings moued with compaſſion, returned and left Moab, waſting and ſpoiling that Region. Others, as it ſeemes with better reaſon, vnderſtand the Text to ſpeake of the ſonne of the king of Edom, whom they ſuppoſe in this irruption to haue beene taken priſoner by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab ſhewed him ore the wals, threatning, vnleſſe the ſiege were diſſolued, that he would offer him in ſacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom beſought thoſe of Iuda and Iſrael to breake off the ſiege for the ſafety of his ſonne: which when the other kings refuſed to yeeld vnto, & that Moab according to his former threatning had burnt the king of Edoms ſonne vpon the rampire, that all the aſſailants might diſcerne it, the king of Edom being by this ſad ſpectacle inraged, forſooke the party of the other kings; for want of whoſe aſſiſtance the ſiege was broken vp. 2 Kings 3.

After this the king of Aram ſent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leproſie. The anſwere of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that he doth ſend to heale a man from his Leproſie? adding, that the Aramite ſought but matter of quarrell againſt him. Eliſha hearing thereof, willed the king to ſend Naaman to him; promiſing that hee ſhould know that there was a Prophet in Iſrael, and ſo Naaman was healed by waſhing himſelfe ſeauen times in Iordan. Eliſha refuſed the gifts of Naaman. But his ſeruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the ſellers of ſpirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon Magus. 2 Kings 5.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damaſcus, hauing heard that this Prophet did diſcouer to the king of Iſrael whatſoeuer the Aramite conſulted in his ſecreteſt councell, ſent a troupe of horſe to take Eliſha: all whom Eliſha ſtrooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaria: Ioram then asked leaue of the Prophet to ſlay them, Eliſha forbad him to harme them: but cauſed them to be fed and ſent back to their own Prince in ſafetie.

The king of Aram notwithſtanding theſe benefits, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreame famine. Ioram imputeth the cauſe thereof to the Prophet Eliſha. Eliſha by prayer cauſed a noiſe of Charriots and armour to ſound in in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the ſiege; an act of great admiration, as the ſame is written in the ſecond of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the kingdome of Syria by the death of his Maiſter, Ioram entring vpon his frontire, tooke Ramoth Gilead: in which warre he receiued diuers wounds, and returned to Ieſrael to be cured. But whileſt he lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets ſent by Eliſha) ſurprized 2 Kings 7.

and ſlew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole poſteritie of Ahab.

Iehu who reigned after Iehoram, deſtroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but alſo their religion; for which he receiued a promiſe from God, That his ſeed ſhould occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatry of Ieroboam, for which he was plagued with greeuous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who ſpoiled all the Countries to the Eaſt of Iordan: in which warre hee was ſlaine, ſaith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are ſilent. Iehu reigned 28. yeeres. Pag. 86.

Ioachaz or Iehoahaz the ſonne of Iehu ſucceeded his father, whom Azael and his ſon Benhadad often inuaded, and in the end ſubiected, leauing him onely 50. horſe, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like duſt beaten into powder. Ioachaz reigned 17. yeeres. 2 King. 13.

After Ioachaz Ioas his ſonne gouerned Iſrael, who when hee repaired to Eliſha the Prophet as hee lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promiſed him three victories ouer the Aramites: and firſt commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Eliſha couered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window weſtward (which was toward Damaſcus) and then ſhoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who ſmote it thrice, and ceaſed: The Prophet then told him, that hee ſhould haue ſmitten fiue or ſixe times, and then he ſhould haue had ſo many victories ouer the Aramites as he gaue ſtrokes. And ſo it ſucceeded with Ioas, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recouered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the ſonne of Azael, which his Father Ioachaz had loſt. He alſo ouerthrew Amazia King of Iuda, who prouoked him to make the warre, whereupon he entred Hieruſalem, and ſacked it with the Temple. This Ioas raigned ſixteene yeeres and died; in whoſe time alſo the Prophet Eliſha exchanged this life for a better. 2 King. 14

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioas his father, an Idolater as his predeceſſors; but he recouered all the reſt of the lands belonging to Iſrael, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift & laſt of the houſe of Iehu, ſlaine by Shallum his vaſſal, who reigned in his ſtead, gouerned ſix moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one month, being ſlaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vſed great cruelty to thoſe that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of thoſe that were with childe. This Menahem being inuaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thouſand talents of ſiluer, which hee exacted by a Tribute of fifty ſhekels from euery man of wealth in Iſrael. Menahem gouerned twenty yeeres. 2 King. 16. 19.

Pekahiah or Phaceia, or after Zonaras Phaceſia, ſucceeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, he was ſlaine by Phaca or Pekah the Commander of his army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekahs time, Phulaſſar or Tiglat-Phylaſſar inuaded the kingdome of Iſrael, and wan Iion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Ianoach, Kedeſh, Haſor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Aſſyria: he was drawne in by Achas king of Iudaea againſt Pekah and Rezin, the laſt of the Adades. For Achas being waſted by Pekah of Iſrael, and by Rezin of Damaſcus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, & therewith ingaged the Aſſyrian, who firſt ſuppreſſed the Monarchy of Syria and Damaſcus, and then of Iſrael: and this inuiting of the great Aſſyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Iſrael and of Iudaea. Pekah reigned twenty yeeres. 2 King. 15. 29.

Then Hoſhea or Oſea, who ſlew Pekah, became the vaſſall of Salmanaſſar; but hoping to ſhake off the Aſſyrian yoke, he ſought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicus king of Ægypt: which being knowne to the Aſſyrian, he caſt him into priſon, beſieged Samaria, and maſtred it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Niniuie in Aſſyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Eaſterne Regions, and there diſperſed them: and replanted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthe (inhabiting about Cutha a riuer in Perſia, or rather in Arabia Deſerta) and with the people Catanei bounding vpon Syria, and with thoſe of Sepharuaiim (a people of Sephar in Meſopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whoſe conqueſt Senacherib vaunteth) alſo with thoſe of Aua, which were of the ancient Auins, who inhabited the Land of the Philiſtims in Abrahams time, dwelling neere vnto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Deſart, called Hauai, willing to returne to their ancient ſeates. To theſe he added thoſe of Chamath or Ituræa, the ancient enemies of the Israelites. and sometime the Vassalls of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian aduise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Iudea, and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driuen thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, hapned in the yeare of the world 3292. the sixth yeare of Ezekiah King of Iuda: and the ninth of Hosea the last King of Israel,

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Iuda, Reuben, Gad, and the other halfe of Manasse.

§. I.

Of Dan, whereof Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

NOw following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Desarts; there entred the Holy Land of their sons 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Ioppe, or Iapho, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Ionas imbarked himselfe when he fled from the seruice of God, towardes Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Macchabæus gouerned the Iewes, the Syrians that were Garrisond in Ioppe, hauing their fleete in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens aboord them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword. V. 46. 1. Mace. 2. 12.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lieutenant vtterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeere of Christ, 1250. Lodouick the French King gaue it new Walles and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Iaffa. There are certaine Rockes in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chaines: & from thence deliuered from the Sea-Monster by Perseus. This Fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Iosephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Ædileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome vpon Ionas speakes of it indifferently.

2. Mac. 12. The next vnto Ioppe was Iamnia, where Iudas Macchabæus burnt the rest of the Syrian fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seene at Hierusalem 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seate, saith Will. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time, that such a place there was.

De Bell. sacr. f. 244.

After Iamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volatteran. And so Montanus seemes to vnderstand it. For he sets it next to Ægypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volaterran giues neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomie sets Anthedon farre to the South of Ioppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteene miles from Ioppe; where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Iosua could not expell, nor the Danites after him: nor any of the Israelites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captaines did diuers others, not much inferiour in strength and stature vnto Goliath.

Hieron. in Micheam.

Roboam the Sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazia destroyed it againe. It was also laid waste by Azael King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the olde ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the holy Warre cals Ibijlin, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

L. 21. c. 18.

Not farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemes, or the house of the Sunne. In the fields adioyning to this City (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsemites presuming to looke therein, there were slain of the Elders 70. and of the people 50000. by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter & the great lamentation of the people: it was called the great* Abel, saith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other Cities of this name; one in [a] Nephtalim: another in Iuda: and another in Isachar. Hierome finds a fifth in Beniamin.

Sa. 1. c. 6. v. 18.

* Or rather not the Citie it selfe but the great stone in the field, vppon which stone the Philistims set the Arke, the change being easy from Eben or Aben, which signifyeth a stone, to Abel which signifieth mourning.

Keeping the Sea-Coast, the strong City of Accaron offereth it selfe, sometime one of the fiue Satrapies, or Gouernments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Cæsaria Palæstinæ. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it selfe against the Danites & Iudæans. It worshipped Beel-zebub the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Ahaziah King of Israel, sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Eliah meeting by the way, caused them to returne, with a sorrowfull answer to their Master. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

[a] See in Nepth. C. 7 § 4. † 6.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Asdod was also an habitation of the Anakims, whom Iosua [b] failed to destroy, though he once possest their Citie. Heerein stoode a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the [c] Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the Arke of God was by the Philistimes carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was vtterly broken and defaced. Neere it was that famous [d] Iudas Macchabæus slain by Bacchides and Alcimus, the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Ionathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neere which also hee ouerthrew Apollonius.

[b] 2 King. 1. but was besieged by Psammetichus, the Father of Pharao Neco for 29. yeeres together, whence Ier. 25 v. 20. speakes of the residue of Asdod, to wit, the greatest part hauing perished in this siedge.

Gabinius the Romane re-built it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in S. Hieromes time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyonde the Fountaine of Æthiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tsorah, or Sarara, and Esthaol, and between them Castra Danis neere Hebron: though this place where Sampson was borne, may seeme by the words, Iud. 18, 12. to bee in the Tribe of

Iudah,

Iudah, as the other alſo were bordering Townes betweene Dan and Iuda.

After theſe within the bounds of Iuda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1. Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebæus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified againſt the Iewes, and neere which himſelfe was by the Macchabees ouerthrowne. 1. Mac. 15.16.

Then Modin the Natiue Citie of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whoſe Sepulcher the ſeuen Marble Pillars, which were erected of that heighth, as they ſerued for a marke to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeeres after their firſt ſetting vp, as Brochard and Breidenbach witneſſe.

There are beſides theſe the Citie of Cariathiarim, that is, the Citie of the woods: ſeated in the border of Iuda, Beniamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twenty yeeres in the houſe of Aminadab: till ſuch time as Dauid carried it thence to Hieruſalem: Of this place (as they ſay) was Zacharias the ſonne of Barachias, or Iehoida, who was ſlaine betweene the Temple and the Altar: alſo Urias whom Ioachim King of Hieruſalem ſlaughtered as we finde in Ieremie. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather as I take it vpon preſumption than warrant, I omitte: as that of Caſpin taken with great ſlaughter by Iudas Machabæus: and Lachis, whoſe King was ſlaine by Ioſua, in which alſo Amazias was ſlaine: The ſame which Senacherib tooke, Ezekias raigning in Iuda. Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, ſee in Ioſua C. 19. from the Verſe 41. where alſo it is added that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Familiès: and therefore that they inuaded Leſhem, and inhabited it: which City after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæſarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Iturea, and Trachonitis: of which coaſts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this Citie ſee more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountaines of fame.

It hath two Riuers or Torrents: the Norther-moſt riſeth out of the Mountaines of Iuda: and paſſing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek or Sored, whoſe bankes are plentifull of Vines which haue no ſeedes or ſtones: The wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, taſte, and ſauour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, ſo called from the Riuer, inhabited Dalila whom Sampſon loued. Hier. in Eſay. & Mucham. Brocb. Breid. Iud. 16 4.

§. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes vp the reſt of the Sea-coaſt of Canaan, to the border of Ægypt: who being the ſecond Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were increaſed of that Familie while they abode in Ægypt, as they were nunbred at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their liues in the Deſarts, there entred the Land of Promiſe of their iſſues 22200. bearing armes, who were * in part mixed with Iuda, and in part ſeuered, inhabiting a ſmal Territorie on the Sea-coaſt, belonging to Edumæa, of which the firſt Citie adioyning to Dan, was Aſcalon.

* And therefore no maruel that diuers places named, Ioſ. 15. in the large portiõ of Iuda be reckoned in this Tribe: ſee Ioſ. 19. v. 1: & 9. where thus much is expreſly noted. Volat. Geog. l. 11. fol. 344.

The Reguli or pettie Kings thereof were called Aſcalonitæ: of which Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the Hiſtorie of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Aſcalus were the ſons of Hymeneus: and that Aſcalus being imployed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an Armie in Syria, falling in loue with a young Woman of that Countrie, built this Citie, and called it after his owne name: the ſame hath Nicolaus in his Hiſtorie, ſaith Volaterran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third booke remembreth a Lake neere Aſcalon, wherein there hath beene a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddeſſe of the Syrians; hauing the face of a Woman, and the bodie of a Fiſh: who, as I haue ſaid before, in the ſtorie of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be caſt into this Lake, and fedde and releeued by Doues. And therefore was the Doue worſhipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palæſtino ſancta Columba Syro.

The white Doue is for holy held, in Syria Palæſtine.

It was one of the chiefeſt and ſtrongeſt Cities of the Philiſtims. It bred many learned men men (ſaith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Soſius, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Hiſtorian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the ſtorie of Bithynia.

Vol. vi ſupra.

In Aſcalon, as ſome ſay, was that wicked Herod borne, that ſeeking after our Sauiour, cauſed all the Male-children of two yeeres olde and vnder to be ſlaine. In the Chriſtian times it had a Biſhop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the Holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many buildings. Eius muros cum Saladinus diruiſſet, Richardus Anglorum Rex inſtaurauit, ſaith Adrichomius.

Adrich. in Trib. Simeon.

In Dauids time it was one of the moſt renowned Cities of the Philiſtims: for hee nameth Gath and Aſcalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Ionathan: not to ſpeaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publiſh it not in the ſtreetes of Aſcalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinius reſtored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

2. Sam.1.

Next to Aſcalon ſtood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrians Azan: of Azonus (as they ſay) the ſonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirme, that it was built by Iupiter. Pomp. Mela giues the building thereof to Cambyſes the Perſian; becauſe belike hee re-built it, and Gaza in the Perſian tongue is as much to ſay as Treaſure. This Gaza was the firſt of the fiue Satrapies of the Philiſtims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Ægypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyſes, as it is prooued by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the ſtrength of the Anakims put him from it. At ſuch time as Alexander Macedon inuaded the Empire of Perſia, it receiued a Garriſon for Darius: in deſpight whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long ſiege demoliſhed, & was called Gaza of the Deſart.

Alexander Ianneus King of the Iewes ſurprized it: and ſlew fiue hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo which fled thither for Sanctuarie: but this Gaza was not ſet vp in the ſame place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouerturned, but ſomewhat neerer the Sea ſide: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gaue many wounds to the Iewes till it was forſt by Simon: of which hee made ſo great account, as that hee purpoſed to reſide therein himſelfe, and in his abſence left Iohn his Soune and Succeſſor to bee Gouernour. In Brochard his time it was ſtill a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name of Gazara.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuer of Beſor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadeſh & Shur, Gen.20.1. That it was neere to the Wilderneſſe of Beer-ſhebah, it appeares Gen.20.31. and therefore no maruell that as elſewhere Beer-ſhebah, ſo ſometime Gerar, bee made the South bound of Canaan. It was of olde a diſtinct Kingdome from the Philiſtim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; Saint Hierome ſaith that afterward it was called Regio ſalutaris; the healthy Countrie: ſo that it was no maruell that Abraham and Iſaac liued much in thoſe parts. Of King Aſa's conqueſt of the Cities about Gerar, ſee 2. Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Tſiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philiſtims had left his carriages there, but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuer of Beſor, and put them to the ſlaughter, and recouered the prey.

Ioſe. 10. 11. 12.

Next Dabir ſometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuerſitie, as they ſay, or Academie of old Paleſtine. In Saint Hieromes time it ſeemes it had the name of

Dauid: Ioſua 15.49. it is called Vrbs Sanna: from the name, as it ſeemes, of ſome of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbs Arbahi. For euen hence alſo were theſe Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othaniel, incouraged by Calebs promiſe of his Daughter in marriage: but that Ioſua and the Hoaſt of Iſrael were at the ſurpriſe, it appeares Ioſ. 10. 39. This Citie Ioſ. 21.15. is named among thoſe which out of Simeon and Iuda were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it ſeemes they attribute it to this Tribe. Ioſ. 21. v. 21.

Beſides theſe, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of leſſe fame, as Hajn, of which Ioſ. 19.7. which alſo Ioſ. 21.16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Iuda and Simeon (for which Iunius thinkes Haſham is named 1. Chron. 6.59. though in the place of Ioſua theſe two are diſtinguiſhed) alſo Tholad ſo named 1. Chron. 4.29. for which Ioſua 19.4. wee haue Eltholad. Chatzar-Suſa ſo named Ioſua 19.5. for which Ioſua 15. we haue Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in ſignification: for Gadda is Turma, and Suſa Equitatus. * And alſo 1. Chron. 4.32.

In the ſame places of Ioſua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the ſame with that of which Numb. 14.45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purſued the Iſraelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumea. For Iſrael fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumea, in the Deſart. Deut. 1.

The ſame places alſo name Beerſheba in this Tribe: ſo called of the Oath betweene Abraham and Abimelec: neere vnto which Hagar wandred with her Sonne Iſmael. It was alſo called the Citie of Iſaac, becauſe hee dwelt long there. While the Chriſtians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to ſtrengthen this place, ſtanding on the border of the Arabian Deſart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Ioſua, and of the Chronicles aboue noted, becauſe they helpe vs nothing in ſtorie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Iuda, certaine of this Tribe being ſtrengthened in their owne Territories, paſſed to * Gedor, as it is, 1 Chron. 4.39. (the ſame place which Ioſ. 15.36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the iſſue of Cham: where they ſeated themſelues: as alſo fiue hundred others of this Tribe, deſtroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places. Gen. 21 31.

* As it ſeemes in the Land of Iuda. See in the firſt Paragraphe of this Chapter in the Cities of Dan. Iud. 16.3.

The Mouutaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampſon the chiefeſt: vnto which hee carried the Gate-poſt of Gaza. The Riuers are Beſor, and the Torrent of Ægypt called Shichar, as is noted in Aſſer.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF IVDA.

OF Iuda the fourth Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Ægypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) periſhed in the Deſarts. And of their ſonnes there entred the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatneſſe of this number was the greateſt Territorie giuen, called afterward Iudea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Cities named in thoſe Tribes, did firſt, as they ſay, belong vnto the Children of Iuda: who had a kinde of Soueraignetie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Bethſemes, Tſiglag, Beerſheba, and others. The multitude of people within this ſmall Prouince (if it be meated by that ground giuen to this Tribe onely) were incredible, if the witneſſe of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbred the people, they were found fiue hundred thouſand fighting men.

The Cities of Iuda were many. But I will remember the chiefeſt of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which ſtandeth in the entrance of Iudea from Idumea: whoſe King firſt ſurprized the Iſraelites as they paſſed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and tooke from them ſome ſpoyles, and many priſoners: who being afterward ouerthrown by the Iſraelites, the ſonnes of Keni, the Kinſmen of Moſes, obtained a poſſeſſion in that Territorie: who before the comming of the Iſraelites, dwelt betweene Madian and Amalek. Num. 21. v. 3. Ioſ. 12 v. 14. Iud. 1. v. 16.

Following this Frontier towards Idumea and the South, Aſcenſus Scorpionis, or Acrabbim is placed: the next to Arad: ſo called becauſe of Scorpions, which are ſaid to bee in Num. 34.4. Deut. 8.15.

that

that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierome thinkes that the name of the Toparchie called Acrabathena was denominated: of which we haue ſpoken in Manaſſes. On the South ſide alſo of Iudæa they place the Cities of Iagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Aſhna, Iethnam, and Aſor or Chatſor, moſt of them Frontier Townes.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places ſo called: one beſides this in the body of Iuda, of which the Deſart and Forreſt adioyning tooke name: where Dauid hid himſelfe from Saul. After theſe are the Cities of Eſron, Adar, Karkah and Aſemona, or Haſmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumæa towards the North, wee finde the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Aſor, or Chatſor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which ſee Ioſ. 15. alſo Carioth by *Ioſua.c.*15.v. 25. called Kerioth: whence Iudas the Traitor was called Iſ-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham the abode of Sampſon which Rehobeam reedified. Beyond theſe towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethar, or Iatthir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called Iethira: and inhabited altogether with Chriſtians: neere vnto this City was that remarkeable battaile fought betweene Aſa King of Iuda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithſtanding beaten and put to flight: Aſa following the victory as farre as Gerar, which at the ſame time he recouered.

Iudg. 15. 8. 1. *Chro.*11.6. Iun. out of the 1. *Chron.*4.32. notes that this Hethã though it were within the bounds of Iuda belonged to Simeon. Ioſ 15.48 Hieron.in loc. Hebr.

Not farre from Iether, ſtandeth Iarmuth, whoſe King was ſlaine by Ioſua, and the City ouerturned. Next vnto it is Mareſa the natiue Citie of the Prophet Michæa: Betweene it and Odolla, Iudas Macchabæus ouerthrew Gorgias, and ſent thence ten thouſand Dragmas of ſiluer to be offered for Sacrifice.

2. *Macc.*12.35

Odolla or Hadullam it ſelfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Ioſua, and the King thereof ſlaine. Ionathas Macchabæus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila or Keila afterward Echela, where Dauid ſometime hid himſelfe: and which afterward he deliuered from the aſſaults of the Philiſtims: neere which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whoſe monument remained, and was ſeene by S^t. Hierome.

*Gen.*38.*v.*1. Ioſ 12.15. 2. Sam 23.1.

Neere it is Hebron, ſometime called the Citie of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatharbe: the reaſon of this name they giue as if it ſignified the Citie of foure: becauſe the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Iſaac, and Iacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but ſuppoſed: and it is plaine by the places, Ioſua 14.14. and 15.13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not ſignifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants called Anakim, whoſe ſonne as it ſeemes Anak was: and Achiman, Sheſhai, and Talmai (whom Caleb expelled, Ioſ. 15.) were he ſons of this Anak, *Num.*13. 23. The name of Anak ſignifieth Torquem, a chaine worne for ornament; and it ſeemes that this Anak inriched by the ſpoyles which himſelfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold, and ſo got this name: and leauing the cuſtome to his poſteritie, left alſo the name: ſo that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amiſſe be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancienteſt Cities of Canaan, built ſeuen yeres before Tſoan or Tanis in Ægypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part giuen, to wit, the Villages adioyning, and the reſt to the Leuites. It had a Biſhop in the Chriſtian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Conſtantine.

Not farre hence they fiude Eleutheropolis or the free Citie, remembred often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon whoſe King Dabir aſſociated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hieruſalem, Hebron, Iarmuth, and Lachis, beſieging the Gibeonites, were by Ioſua vtterly ouerthrowne. From hence the next Citie of fame was Emaus, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Gouernment or Præſidencies of Iudæa. In ſight of this Citie Iudas Macchabæus (after hee had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gaue a third ouerthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the yeare 1301. it was ouerturned by an earth-quake, ſaith Euſebius. In the Chriſtian times it had a Biſhops ſeate of the Dioceſſe of Cæſaria of Palaſtine.

From Emaus toward the Weſt Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which and of Gederoth [a] *Ioſ.*15.*v.*36. and 41. Then Azecha, to which Ioſua followed the ſlaughter of the fiue Kings before named, a Citie of great great ſtrength in the Valley of [a] Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, 1. Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it ſeemes) they ſeat it neere vnto Soco, and vnto Lebna of the Leuites. It reuolted from the ſubiection of the Iewes while Ioram the ſonne of Ioſaphat ruled in Hieruſalem: And next vnto this ſtandeth Maceda, which Ioſua vtterly diſpeopled.

On the other ſide of Emaus towards the Eaſt ſtandeth Bethſur, otherwiſe Bethſora, and Bethſor: one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt fought for places in all Iuda. It is ſeated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethſur (the houſe on the Rocke, or of ſtrength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Iudas Macchabaus. Lyſias forſt it, and Antiochus Eutapor by famine: Ionathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified againſt the Syrian Kings. Ioſe.13. ant.9. Macc.1.6.

Bethleem is the next vnto it within ſixe miles of Hieruſalem, otherwiſe Lehem: ſometime Ephrata; which name, they ſay, it had of Calebs wife, when as it is ſo called by Moſes before Caleb was famous in thoſe parts, *Gen.*38.16. Of this Citie was Abeſſan or Ibzan, Iudge of Iſrael, after Iephtah, famous for the thirty Sonnes and thirty Daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was alſo a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi ſojourned in Moab during the famine of Iuda in the time of the Iudges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and maried Boaz, of whom Obed, of whom Iſhai, of whom Dauid. It had alſo the honour to bee the natiue Citie of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt; and therefore ſhall the memorie thereof neuer end. Geneſ.53.48. Ruth. 1.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was alſo a Citie of the ſame name: and therefore was this of our Sauiour called Bethleem Iuda. Hieron in com. ſuper. Mat c.2. Math 2.1.

From Bethleem ſome foure or fiue mile ſtandeth Thecua, the Citie of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the Citie of Bethzacaria, in the way betweene Bethſura and Hieruſalem: on whoſe Hills adioyning the glorious guilt ſhields of Antiochus ſhined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Iewes. The Citie of * Bezek was alſo neere vnto Bethleem, which Adoni-Bezec commanded, who had during his raigne tortur'd 70. Kings, by cutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes: and made them gather bread vnder his Table: but at length the ſame end befell himſelfe by the ſonnes of Iuda, after they had taken him priſoner. Amos. 1. v. 1. 1. Mac. 6. 32. Ioſeph. ant 12. c. 14. 1. Mac. 6. v. 36 * See in Manaſſ. C. 7. § 7. †. 1. Iud. 1. v. 5. et. 7

The reſt of the Cities in this part (moſt of them of no great eſtimation) we may paſſe by vntill wee come to the magnificent Caſtle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble ſteps, exceeding beautifull and ſtrong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Deſart of Iaruel, betweene it and Tekoa, is that cliuaus floridus, where in the time of Iehoſaphat, the Iewes ſtood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, maſſacring one another, when they had purpoſed to ioyne againſt Iuda: neere which place is the Valley of bleſſing, where the Iewes the fourth day after, ſolemnely came and bleſſed God for ſo ſtrange deliuerance. Ioſe. 14 ant. 22 2. Chron. 20. vt 16. & 26.

Now the Cities of Iuda which border the Dead Sea, are theſe; Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tſohar which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: ſo called becauſe Lot in his praier for it vrged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tſohar, which ſignifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is *Gen.*14.2. In the Romanes times it had a Garriſon, and was called (as they ſay) Pannier: in Hieromes time Balexona. Then Engaddi or Hen-gaddi, firſt Aſaſonthamar: neere vnto which are the Gardens of Balſamum, the beſt that the world had called Opobalſamum: the moſt part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queene of Ægypt ſent for out of Iudæa, and Herod who either feared or loued Anthonie her husband, cauſed them to be rooted vp and preſented vnto her: which ſhee replanted neere Heliopolis in Ægypt. This Citie was firſt taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the moſt remarkeable Cities of Iudæa: and one of the Preſidencies thereof. 2. Chron. 11. * Some call it Bal-ſaliſa and Vitula conſternans. See in Gad c. 10. §. 5. poſt principium in Haroher. Gen. 19. 20. Hieron. in Oſee Hebr. Chatſatſon-thamar. 2. Chron. 20. 2. Gen. 14. 7.

The reſt of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Ieſrael; not that which was the Citie of Naboth, of which alreadie: but another of the ſame name, the Citie of Achinoan, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Ammon, whom Abſalom ſlew: alſo as ſome thinke the Citie of Amaſa, Abſalons Lieutenant, and the commander of his Armie. But this ſeemeth to be an error grounded vpon the neereneſſe of the words, Iſrael and Ieſrael: and becauſe the 2. *Sam.*17.25. Amaſaes father is called a Iſraelite, who firſt of the *Chron.*2.17. is called an Iſmaelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthographie ſheweth that Amaſaes Father is not ſaid to be of the Citie Ieſrael, but an Iſraelite in Religion, though otherwiſe an Iſmaelite. 1. Reg.21. 2. Sam. 17. 25.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills and Mountaines, as thoſe of Engaddi vpon the the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Iuda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neere Taphna, and these part Iuda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron: at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham, which S. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree; and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the yonger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achilæ, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the olde Castle, erected by Ionathas Macchabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with 27. high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men, being as it seemeth a place vnaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

Ioseph. 14 Ant. c. 20.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Countrie had foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gamorra, destroyed with fire from Heauen for their vnnaturall sinnes.

§. IIII.

THE TRIBE OF REVBEN and his Borderers.

†. I.

The seates and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanne from Sehon King of Hesbon.

IN the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Iacobs sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before we speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Iordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first wee are to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Iacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Iewes: by Esau or Edom the Idumæans: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possest by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Iacob, whose children were bred in Ægypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Esau and his sonnes held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael tooke from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sur to Hauilah.

Moab tooke the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betweene Iordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as farre North as Esebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon sate downe on the North-east side of Arnon, and possest the Tract from Rabba afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilbead, and without them as farre forth as Arroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border betweene the Riuer of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselues, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Iordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possest by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedorlahomer, after expulsed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzummims or Zuzes, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Iosua. 13.

Num. 21. v. 24

Gen. 14.

Now where it is writen that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be vnderstood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancester beaten beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countries, betweene Abarim and Iordan, and driuen them from Hesbon ouer Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arriuall vpon that border, when Vaheb gouerned the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Vaheb, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were electiue, as the Edumeans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab betweene Arnon and Iordan, as farre North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arriued there out of Ægypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Iephtah the Iudge of Israel iustly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claime of the Ammonites: because (as he alleadged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Iephtah) had 300. yeers time to recouer them, and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now. Iudg. 11.

And lest any should marueil why the Ammonites in Iephtahs time should make claime to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Numb. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to haue beene the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the yron bed of Og was to be seene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehons was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, & Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Iephtahs time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soueraignetie: and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Arroer belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking aduantage of the time, they then sought to recouer it againe. Yet at such time as Moses ouerthrew Sehon at Iahaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Arroer, and betweene it and Iaboc: Sehon and Og two Kings of the Amorites hauing displanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. v. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iaboc, euen vnto the children of Ammon, so as at this time the Riuer of Iaboc was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions ouer Iaboc, which at length the Gadites possest, as in the the 13. chapter of Iosua, vers. 25. it appeares. Ios 13. ver. 25. Iunius notes that the one halfe of the Land of Hammon which in this place of Iosua is said to haue beene giuen to the Gadites, was take first from the Ammonites by Sehon: but the place Deute 3. 11. proues that aswell Og, as Sehon, had gotten Lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THe chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Iethson. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two verses 36. and 37. in 21. Ios. being wanting in the olde Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slipt into Iethson. Ios 21. 37.

This Citie which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Desart adioyning: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Iosua where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Beser & villa eius, reades Boser in solitudine Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Towne called Misor, in the border betweene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth neere the Dead Sea (for the Countrie betweene being Mountainous hath few Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lasa or Leshash, of which Genesis 10. verse 19. The Greekes call it Callirhoe: neere which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water, all which soone after their rising, being ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contraction of sinewes: to which Herod the elder, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macherus in this Tribe. The like fountaines are found in the Pyrenyes: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Ingas or Kings. The other towne is Macherus, the next betweene Lasa and Iordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land Citie and Castle, standing vpon a Mountaine Deut. 2. 26. It was a marginall note out of the 3. Deut. where the 76. kept the word Misor, signifying a plaine, which after crept into the Text. *Ioseph. 17. ant. c. 9 & Hieron. in quæst. euery way vnaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Iannaus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinius, in the war with Aristobulus, saith Iosephus. It was thither (saith Iosephus) that Herod sent Iohn Baptist, and wherein hee was slaine: his armie soone after being vtterly ouerthrowne by Aretas King of Arabia, and himselfe after this murther neuer prospering. Not farre from Macherus was Bosor or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and neere it Liuias vpon Iordan, which Herod built in honour of Liuia the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

Deu.4.43. Ios.20.8. Euseb. in Chro. Hier.in loc.heb.

To the North of Liuias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi, with his speare, bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the midst of their sinne: and from hence Iosua sent the Discouerers to view Ierico, staying heere vntill hee went ouer Iordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreames of, reading Ioel 3.18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius, vallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the iust being placed, grow as the Cedars, Psal. 92.13.

Num. 25.1.

Ios. 3.1.

The plaine Country hereabout, by Moses called The Plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomie to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desert of Paran, where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chatseroth, & Dizahab (of which two the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomie in Palæstina, the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petræa, where was * Mezahab, of which, *Gen.*36.39.) by the Geographers called Medaua and Medaba. On the West it had Iordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deuteron. 1.1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Liuias, of which euen now wee spake.

Deut.34.1.

* The same as it seems which *Num.*21.30. is called Medeba whence wee reade of the plaines of Medeba, Ios 13 v. 9.16. of which also wee reade in the wars of Dauid against Hanũ the Ammonite. 1 Chr. 19.7. Also, 1.Macc. 9.36. Esai. 16.2. See before *c.*5. §.7.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Cœlesyria, it had Theophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Cœlesyria stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be ouer-against or neere vnto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 2.14. it translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, vseth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph or Suphah: which doubtlesse was about these Plaines of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Countrey, being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as also the red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plaines of Moab, where Moses made those diuine exhortations, some say was Bethabara where Iohn baptized, which in the Storie of Gedeon is called Beth-bara. Iosephus saies it was where after the Citie Abila stood, neere Iordan, in a place set with Palme trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the Plaines of Moab, *Numb.*33.49. (that some call Abel sathaim and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim; which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Ioh.1 28. Iud.7 24. Iosep.ant. 4.7. Num.25.1. Exod.25.10.

Toward the East of these plaines of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baall-Meon, Sibma and Hesbon the chiefe Citie of Sehon, and Elhabel, and Kiriathaima the seate of the Giants Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seemes to giue a note that the names were to be changed: because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatrie. For Nebo (in stead of which Iunius, Es. 46.1. reades Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgah, Moses before his death saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Iordan. In which storie Iunius doth not take Phasgah or Pisgah, for any proper name: but for an appellatiue, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatablus in some places; as Num. 21.20. where hee noteth that some call Pisgah that top which looketh to Ierscho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned *Ios.*13 20. called Asbdoth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisgæ: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Pisga. In the same place of Iosua there is also named Beth-peor, as belon-belonging to Reuben: ſo called from the Hill Peor: from whence alſo Baal the Idoll was called Baal-peor, which they ſay was the ſame as Priapus: the cheefe place of whoſe worſhip ſeemes to haue beene Bamoth-Baal, of which alſo Ioſ. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which Num. 22. 41. they reade the high places of Baal (for ſo the word ſignifieth) to which place Balaak firſt brought Balaam to curſe the Iſraelites.

*Num.31.v.37 Gen.14.v.5. Num.32. * Exod.23.13. Nomen deorum alienorũ ne recordamini, ne audiatur in ore tuo. Ps.16.4. Ho assumpturus sũ nomina eorũ in labijs meis. Hos. 2.17. amouebo nomina Baalimorum ab eorum.*

What name they vſed for Nebo it doth not appeare: but Baal-meon it ſeemes they named ſometime Baioth, as Ez. 15. 2. and ſomtime Beth-meon Eſa. 48. 23.

†. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

THere were beſides theſe diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongſt which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gaue his Daughter Michal from Dauid: but Iunius thinkes this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering ſo much out of Eſay 10. verſ. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Beniamin. With better reaſon perhaps out of Numb. 21. v. 19. wee may ſay that Mathana and Nahaliel were in thoſe confines of Reuben: through which places the Iſraelites paſt after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the reſt of the Cities of Moab. 1. Sam. 25. v. vlt. Hierem. 48.

Madian alſo is found in theſe parts, the cheefe Citie of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea; wherein Iethro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which theſe of Moab became Idolaters, and receiued an exceeding ouerthrow by a Regiment of twelue thouſand Iſraelites, ſent by Moſes out of the plaines of Moab: at ſuch time as Iſrael began to accompanie their Daughters: their fiue Kings with Balaam the Soothſayer were then ſlaine: and their Regall Citie with the reſt deſtroyed. The other Madianites ouer whom Iethro was Prince, or Prieſt, forgat not the God of Abraham their Anceſtor; but relieued & aſſiſted the Iſraelites in their painfull trauails, through the Deſerts: and were in all that paſſage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and ſometime reckoned as the chiefe City of Edom, there is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was alſo called Ioctheel, as appeares by the place 2. Reg. 14. It was built (ſaith Ioſephus) by Recem, one of thoſe fiue Kings of the Madianites ſlaine as before is ſaid: after whom it was called Recem: Now they ſay it is called Crac and Mozera. The Soldans of Ægypt, for the exceeding ſtrength thereof, kept therein all their treaſures of Ægypt aud Arabia: of which it is the firſt and ſtrongeſt Citie: the ſame perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Nabathea, whence alſo the Prouince adioyning tooke name: which name ſeemes to haue been taken at firſt from Nabaioth the ſonne of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where vnderſtood for all Arabia Petræa, (at leaſt where it is not miſ-underſtood) but it is that Prouince which neighboureth Iudæa. For Pharan inhabited by Iſmael, whoſe people Ptolomie calleth Pharanites, in ſtead of Iſmaelites, and all thoſe Territories of the Cuſites, Madianites, Amalekites, Iſmaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Baſan, were parts of Arabia Petræa: though it bee alſo true, that ſome part of Arabia the Deſert belonged to the Amalekites, and Iſmaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the firſt of Chronicles the fifth calls Hagarims of Hagar. Lib. 4. Ant. 7. 1. Chro 5. v. 19. & 20.

This Citie Petra, Scaurus beſieged with the Roman Armie, & finding the place in ſhew impregnable, he was cõtent by the perſwaſion of Antipater, to take a compoſition of monie, & to quit it. Yet Amaſias king of Iuda (after he had ſlaughtered 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) wan alſo this City. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabite to be naturall of this City. In the meane time when the Chriſtians held the Kingdome of Hieruſalem, it had a Latine Biſhop, hauing before been vnder the Greeke Church. It is ſeated not far from Hor where Aaron died, & on the other ſide towards the North is the riuer of Zared or Zered, by which Moſes incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichome deſcribeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and betweene Zared and Arnon: and ſo hee doth the Valley of Saue: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it ſeemes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refreſh the plaines of Moab: and the cõfluence of thoſe waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Saue alſo cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, & vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the purſuit of the Aſſyrian and Perſian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Saue, or Saueh, which is the Kings Dale, where Abſalom ſet vp his Monument, as it ſeemes, not farre from Hieruſalem. And at the ſame time Melchizedec King of Salem Gul. Tyr. 20. bell ſacr. Numb. 21. Deut. 2. 13. Num. 32. 3. Ioſ. 13. 27. Eſa. 15. 1.

alſo incountred him. But Abraham comming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either neere Bethſan otherwiſe Scythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manaſſe, or in Hieruſalem (both places lying to the Weſt of Iordan) could not incounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Saue, which was alſo called the Kings Dale, could not be in theſe parts.

†. IIII.
Of the Dead Sea.

NOw becauſe the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called alſo the Lake of Aſphaltitis, and the ſalt Sea (in diſtinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was freſh water) alſo the Sea of the Wilderneſſe, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is often remembred in the Scriptures, and in this ſtorie alſo, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to ſpeake ſomewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Caſpian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Ioſephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which makes 18. of our miles and ſomewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale leſſe. But thoſe that haue of late yeeres ſeene this Sea, did account it (ſaith Weiſſenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirtie of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus eſt in immenſo ambitu, ſpecie maris, ſapore corruptior, grauitate odoris accolis peſtifer: neq; vento impellitur, neq; piſces aut ſuetas aquis volucres patitur, incertum vnde ſuperiecta vt ſolido feruntur, periti imperitiq; nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taſte: of ſmell infectious, and peſtilent to the borderers. It is neither moued nor raiſed by the winde: nor indureth fiſh to liue in it, or fowle to ſwimme in it. Thoſe things that are caſt into it, and the vnskilfull of ſwimming, aſwell as the skilfull, are borne vp by this water. At one time of the yere it caſteth vp Bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath alſo taught. It is vſed in the trimming of ſhips, and the like buſineſſes.

And then of the Land, he ſpeaketh in this ſort: "The fields not farre from this Lake, "which were ſometime fruitfull and adorned with great Cities were burnt with lightning; of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a ſad face, as hauing loſt "her fruitfulneſſe; for whatſoeuer doth either grow or is ſet thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripeneſſe, haue nothing within them, but moulder into aſhes: "Thus farre Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that thoſe Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe ſtill grow on the bankes of this curſed Lake, doe looke faire, and are of good colour on the out-ſide, but being cut haue nothing but duſt within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake caſteth vp, it was by the Greekes called Aſphaltis. Veſpaſian deſirous to be ſatisfied of theſe reports, went of purpoſe to ſee this Lake, and cauſed certaine Captiues to be caſt into it, who were not onely vnskilfull in ſwimming, but had their hands alſo bound behind them, and notwithſtanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not ſinke.

* So Iunius reades for the Hebrew Haraboth euerie where, and ſo alſo the editiõ of Vatablus, Deutr.3.17. though Deutr. 4.44. it hath mare ſolitudinis, as alſo 2. Reg.14.25. the reaſon of this name ſeemes to be, becauſe it ioynes to the plaines of Moab which are called Harboth Moab, Deutr. 34.1. as alſo we haue Ceſuloth in Harbath, that is in the plaines, to wit, of Zabulon, 1.Macch.9 2. whence Adrichomius imagines a City in Zabulon called Araba. a Deſcr. terr. Sanct.1.

†. V.
Of the Kings of Moab, much of whoſe Country within Arnon Reuben poſſeſt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whoſe Country (within Arnon) Reuben poſſeſt (though not taken from Moab but frõ Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Iunius in the 21. of Numbers, verſ. 14. nameth Vaheb, which ſeems to be the Anceſtor or Predeceſſor of Balac, the ſon of Zippor: which Balac ſent for Balaam to curſe Iſrael. For fearing to contend with Moſes by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams curſings or inchantments, to take from them all ſtrength and courage, and to caſt on them ſome peſtilent diſeaſes; And though Balaam at the firſt, moued by the ſpirit of God, bleſt Iſrael contrary to the hope and deſire of Moab: yet being deſirous in ſome ſort to ſatiſfie him, and to doe him ſeruice, he aduiſed Moab to ſend Madianitiſh Women among the Iſraelites: hoping by them, as by fit inſtruments of miſchiefe, to draw them to the Idolatrie of the Heathen: but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his euill counſaile, and was ſlaine among the reſt of the Princes of Midian.

Num.21.22. 25.24. Ioſ.24.

After theſe times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: ſauing that wee finde in the firſt of Chronicles the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Ioaſh, and Sareph, Sareph, all being of the iſſue of Iuda, ſometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the ſame Verſe, Theſe alſo are ancient things: to wit, as ſome expound it, the particulars of theſe mens Gouernments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hæc prius fuere, theſe Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their poſterity chuſe rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there. v. 22.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec maſtered Iſrael, and commanded them eighteene yeeres: which Eglon, Ehud ſlew in his owne houſe, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom Dauid fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the ſame againſt whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifeſt, for neither are named. But in reſpect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he receiued Dauid, and releeued him; knowing that Saul ſought his life. Iudg. 3. 1. Sam. 22. 1. Sam. 14.

After this, Dauid himſelfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the ſame Kings time: for hee ſlaughtered two parts of the people; and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was ſaid of Dauid, Moab is my waſh-pot, ouer Edom will I caſt my ſhoe: meaning that hee would reduce them to ſuch an abiection, and appoint them for baſe ſeruices: And that he would tread downe the Idumæans. 2. Sam. 8. 1. Chron. 18. Pſal. 60. v. 10.

The next King after Dauids time, of the Moabites, whoſe name liueth, was Meſha: who falling from Iuda, (perhaps in remembrance of the ſeueritie of Dauid) faſtened himſelfe to the Kings of Iſrael, and paid tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, with the wooll: who reuolting againe from Iſrael after the death of Ahab, was inuaded be Iehoram: with whom ioyned the Kings of Iuda & Idumea: and being by theſe three Kings preſt and broken, hee fledde to Kir-hareſeth, as is elſewhere ſhewed. There is alſo mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, aſſiſted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, inuaded Iehoſhaphat: and by reaſon of ſome priuate quarrels among themſelues, the Moabites and Ammonites ſet vpon the Idumæans, and ſlaughtered them: and then one againſt another; ſo as Iehoſhaphat had a notorious victorie ouer them all, without either bloud or wound. Alſo in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Meſha of Moab many deſcents: for Meſhe liued with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekias time, fourteene Kings of Iuda comming betweene, who waſted three hundred and odde yeeres. 2. Reg. 3. 2. Chron. 20. Hierem. 27.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THe Territory adioyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which ioyned to the Mountaines, was ſometime in the poſſeſſion of the Ammonites, as farre to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad the ſeuenth ſon of Iacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Ægypt, and died in the Deſarts, 45550. and of their ſonnes there entred the Land promiſed, 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manaſſe the Riuer of Iaboc diuided them: from Reuben the Cities of Heſbon, Elhele, and Aphec. Gen. 30. Num. 1. 32. 26 Ioſ. 13.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer: which they make to be the ſame with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Iunius attending diligentlie to thoſe words of Moſes, Deut. 2. 36. Ab harahero, quæ eſt in ripa fluminis Arnon, & Ciuitate ipſa quæ eſt in flumine; Where the Citie in the Riuer is diſtinguiſhed from the Citie vpon the banke of the Riuer, (as alſo in like manner Ioſ. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Haroher which doubtleſſe belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is ſaid that they built it) was indeede ſeated neere Har of the Moabites, but diuerſe from it. For that Har was neuer poſſeſt by Moſes, it is plaine Deuteronomie 2. 9. where God forbidding Moſes to touch it, ſaith hee hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the ſonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is ſaid to be within and in the middle of the Riuer of Arnon (and ſo diſtinguiſhed from Haroher, which is ſaid in the ſame places to be on the banke of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the ſame Iunius prooueth out of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is ſaide to bee diuided into diuers ſtreames, where or among which Har is ſeated: And the ſame is confirmed by the place of Ioſ. 13. 25. where Haroher is ſaid to bee ſeated before Rabbah: which Rabbah as it ſeemes, cannot bee the Esa. 15. Deut. 2.

Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seate not Haroher neere it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah heere we must vnderstand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har: and so wee must needs distinguish it from Haroher. And as for * Har (which also gaue the name to the coast adioyning) it seemes it continued in the possession of the Moabites after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Haroher by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being wonne from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seemes in the story of Iephtha, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites againe by the Israelites vnder the conduct of Iephtha. In S. Hieromes time the greatest part of this Citie perished by an earthquake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saued himselfe, in the destruction of Sodom, seated not farre hence: which they say was therefore called Vitula conſternans, because as a wanton tumbling Heifer, she was thrice ouerthrowne with earth-quake: for which cause also Hierome seemes to thinke that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14.2.) and Salisha which hath a signification of the ternarie number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

* Deut.2.9. Out of which place the words, Num. 21.28. are to be expounded not that the citie of Hor, but the coast adioyning was wasted by Sehon.

*Gen.*14.5. Iud. 11.35. Hier. in epitap. Paul. et in quæſt. & loc. Hebr. see Iunius his annotations vpon 1.*Sam.*9.2. where hee makes Shalisha a plain Countrie in Beniamin, and the same with Balshalisha, 2. Reg. 4. 42. where he expounds Bal or Bahal to be as much as planities. *Esa.*15. *Hier.*48. Esa. 15. 21.

Brochard takes Haroher to be Petra, but erroniously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab, adioyning to Edom, whereas Haroher is in the North-east border. Betweene Haroher and Iordan they seate Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to haue built it, Numb. 32. 34. though Iosua 13. vers. 17. it is said that Moses gaue it to the Reubenites. Of this Citie among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hieremie prophecied, that it should perish: and the Lakes about it runne with the bloud of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neere Arnon in Saint Hieromes time.

Iud. 8. 11.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay prophecieth. That the waters thereof should be dried vp: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not farre from Bethnimrah in this Tribe Adrichomius placeth Iogbeha, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which wee reade in the storie of Gedeon: and that Iogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appeares, Numb. 32. 35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certaine: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith hee) went and tooke Kenath with her Townes, and called it Nobach of his owne name, where because the verses precedent speake of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would haue seuered this seate of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, *v.*34.35.36. therefore it may seeme that this * Noboch was in than part of Manasse, which was in the East of Iordan: though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas hee supposeth it to bee the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speake [a] in the Tribe of Beniamin. And as for that Karkor where Zebach and Salmunah rested themselues in their flight from Gedeon, to which place Gedeon marched through this Naboch and Iogbeha, though some place in it Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15. and 2. Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certaine that it was a principall Citie held still by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

*Num.*32.34.

* *Num.*21.30. It is called Nophach, & placed in the border of the kingdome of Sehō, towards Basā, and therefore it is not altogether vnprobable that it was in Gad.

a Chap.12.§. 1. *Iud.*8 10.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Sophan: for which later the Vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Shophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corona.

*Num.*32.34. 35.

In the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon, together with Bethnimrah, of which we haue spoken, *Iosua.cap.*13. v. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, *Numb.*32.36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimra, is said to haue been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Iosua it is called Beth-Haram,) some take to be Betaramptha, (of which [b] Iosephus) after by Herod called Iulias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-Haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramaths there is mention in [c] Iosephus) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idoll of those Countries, wee reade, Acts 7.43. and to which Iunius referres the name of the Citie Rephan, 1. Machab. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolue. But touching Iulius (according to Iosephus sometimes Bataramptha) the same Iosephus placeth in the Region of Perea, beyond Iordan, which Regio Perea, as the Greeke word signifieth, is no more then Regio vltcrior, the Countrie beyond the Riuer; and therefore they which labour to ſet downe the bounds of this Perea, take more paines then needes. Foureteene Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Ioſephus. He makes it to haue Ant.20.11. beene built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias, in honour of the adoption of Liuia, Auguſtus his Wife, into the Inlian family: by which adoption ſhe was called Iulia. Another Iulias, hee ſaith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, Ioſep.Ant.18.3 & Bel.Iud.2.8 which, he ſaith, is the ſame as Bethſaida.

Vpon the Sea of Galilee neere to Iulias in Perea, (that is, in the Region ouer Iordan) they finde Vetezobra, as it is called in Ioſephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus biſſopi. Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for ſafegard in the time of Warre with the Romanes, came with many others into Hieruſalem, and was there beſieged, Ioſephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable Hiſtory; how for hunger ſhe ate her owne childe, with other tragicall accidents hereupon enſuing. Ioſep.de Bell. Iud.l.7.c.8.

Of Succoth (which we ſaid *Ioſ.*13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon) it is plaine by the ſtory of Gedeon that it is neere vnto Iordan: where it is ſaid, that as he was paſt Iordan with his three hundreth, wearie in the purſuit of Zebah and Salmunah, hee requeſted reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideons returne were by him tortured, as it ſeemes vnder a threſhing Carre of Tribulum, betweene which and their fleſh he put Thornes to teare their fleſh as they were preſt and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which ſort alſo Dauid vſed ſome of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which ſignifieth ſuch Tabernacles as were made in haſte, either for Men or Cattell, Moſes, *Gen.*33.17. witneſſeth that the originall of the name was from ſuch harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Meſopotamia built in that place: as alſo the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Iſrael, as they came from Rameſes in Ægypt, had their firſt Station, was vpon like reaſon called Succoth: becauſe there they ſet vp their firſt Tabernacles or Tents: which they vſed after for forty yeeres in the Wilderneſſe. In remembrance whereof, the Feaſt of Succoth, or Tabernacles was inſtituted. Iud.8.5. 2 Sam.12.31. Exod.12.37. Leuit.23.43.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named, *Ioſ.*21.38. Ramoth in Gilehad, Machanaïm, Chesbon, and Iahzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites, of which Iahzer, as Chesbon or Hesbon was a chiefe Citie of Sehon, whence *Num.*32.1. his Countrie is called the Land of Iahzer. It was taken by Moſes, hauing firſt ſent ſpies to view it. In the firſt of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilehad. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the prophecie of Eſay, touching Moab) it was poſſeſſed by the Moabites: to which place of Eſay alſo Hieremie in a like prophecie alludes. It was at length regained (but as it ſeemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Maccabæus: as it is *1 Mace.*5.8. where Iunius out of Ioſephus reades Iahzer though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Ioſua 16.3. & 8. and *Iud.*1.29.) was farre from theſe Countries of Sehon, ſeated in the Weſt border of Ephraim, not poſſeſſed by the Iſraelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Ægypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter. Num.22.32. 1 Chro.27.31. Eſay 6.8. Hierē.48.32.

Of Chesbon it may be maruelled that in the place of Ioſua, and *1 Chron.*6.81. it ſhould be ſaid to haue beene giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, ſeeing Ioſua 13.*v.*17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and ſuch as little trouble themſelues with ſuch ſcruples, finding Casbon, *1 Mace.*5.36. among the Cities of Gilehad, taken by Iudas Maccabæus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Casbon had beene the Chesbon of Gad: and that of Reuben diſtinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betweene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites, for ſo alſo it ſeemes that in like reaſon Dibon is ſaid in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaïm, which word ſignifieth a double Armie, we reade *Gen.*32.2. that it was therefore ſo called, becauſe the Angels of God in that place met Iacob in manner of another Hoſte or company, to ioyne with his for his defence: as alſo Luke 2.13. wee reade of a multitude of the Hoſte of Heauen, which appeared to the ſheepeherds, at the time of our Sauiours birth: and ſo vnto the Godly King Oſwald of Northumberland, when hee was ſoone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the

Battaile

Battaile was fought in the North-parts of England, is called Heauen-field. In this Citie of Machanaïm Dauid abode during the rebellion of Absalom: and the same for the strength thereof Abner chose for the seat of Ishboseth, during the warre betweene Dauid and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilehad, we read often in the Scripture, for the recouering of which King Achab lost his life. Iunius thinkes that Ramatha-Mitspe, of which Iosua 13.26. was this Ramoth in Gilehad. Concerning the place where Laban and Iacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilehad, which is as much as a witnessing heape, because of the heape of Stones which Laban and his sonnes left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitspah, which signifieth ouer-looking (because there they called God to ouer-see and be witnesse to their couenant) it is plaine by the place, *Gen.*31.49. that in these parts there was not onely a Towne, but likewise a Region called Mitspa, it appeares, *Ios.*11.3. where we reade of the Chiuuites vnder Hermon, in the Countrie of Mitspa, *the Towne of Mitspa, as it seemes both by this place, and in the eight verse following, being not in the Hill Countrie, but in the valley. But seeing that Iephta the Iudge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob, (whither his brethren had driuen him) dwelt in this Towne of Mitspa, who doubtlesse was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seeme that they doe not well which place this Towne of Mitspa rather in Gad, than in Manasse. By Iudas Macchabeus this Towne of Mitspa (whether in Gab or in Manasse) was vtterly spoiled and burnt, and males of it slaine: for it was then possest of the Ammonites.

Betweene Succoth (of which we haue spoken) and the Riuer Iaboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was seene: so called for memorie of the Angels appearing to Iacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishnesse of which Citie, in refusing to relieue Gideon, was the cause that in his returne he ouerthew their Towre, and slew the chiefe Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, then adde Rogelim, the Citie of that great and faithfull subiect Barzillai, as it seemes, not farre from Mahanaima, where he sustained King Dauid, during Absaloms rebellion. To these they adde the Towne of Gaddi, Arnon, & Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more then Gaddita, is ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnon also no where appeares to be the name of a Towne, but still of a Riuer. Alimis Adrichomius frames of אלמון, 1 *Mac.*5.26. so that the name should rather be Alema, but Iunius out of Iosephus reades Malla, for this in Alimis: and vnderstanding Malla to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio, (as wee haue shewed touching the Millo of the Sichemites) hee takes this Malla, to bee Mitspa Moabitarum, of which 1 *Sam.*22.3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moses noteth to be as farre as the furthest of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 *Mac.*5.10. (which Iunius takes to be a Rithma, of which *Numb.*33.18. a place of strength in the Territorie of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vincarum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last wee reade in Iephta's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seemes by that place of the booke of Iudges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both farre remoued from the Gadites. But the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites was neerer, and not farre from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbath, as *Deut.*3.11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that *Philadelphia which Ptolomie findes in Celosyria. Hierome and Calistus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seemes neuer possest by the Israelites, after the ouerthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall seate of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzammims, which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recouered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who hauing beene first beaten by the Assyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had beene) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumæans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerours for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and betweene them recouered the best

*Other names of this Citie according to Stephanus were Ammana and Astarte: but in this latter perhaps he mistooke, which might seeme to be the same Astaroth one of the chiefe Cities of Og, of which in that which remaineth to be spoken of Manasses, Adrichomius sayes, it was also called Vrbs aquarum, because of the part of all the Valley, betweene the Mountaines and Iordan. For this Og was alſo maſter of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the poſſeſſion of the one or of the other of theſe two, Moſes and Iſrael found all thoſe Cities and Countries which were giuen to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manaſſe. So that though it were 450. yeeres ſince that theſe Zamzummims or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing theſe two Kings of one kinred, and both valiant and vndertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, boih Amorites, they recouered againe much of their loſt poſſeſſions, and thruſt the ſonnes of Lot ouer the mountaines, and into the Deſarts. And as the Kings or Captaines of Perſia and Aſſyria, (remembred in the 14. of Geneſis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom, ſo by that great conqueſt which Moſes had ouer thoſe two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunitie to looke backe againe into thoſe plaines; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manaſsites forſooke the worſhip of the liuing God, and became ſloathfull and licentious, they taking the aduantage inuaded them, and caſt them out of their poſſeſſions: and were ſometime their maſters, ſometime their tributaries, as they pleaſed or diſpleaſed God: and according to the wiſedome and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the yron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Dauids time, and the inhabitants ſlaine with great ſeuerity, and by diuers torments. At the firſt aſſault thereof Vrias was ſhot to death, hauing beene by direction from Dauid appointed to be imployed in the leading of an aſſault, where he could not eſcape: wherein alſo many of the beſt of the Armie periſhed: and wherein Dauid ſo diſpleaſed God, as his affaires had ill ſucceſſe afterward, euen to his dying day. From hence had Dauid the weighty and rich crowne of gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which as ſome expound it, was vſed to be put on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the time of Chriſtians it had a Metropolitan Biſhop, and vnder him twelue others.

Theſe mountaines are very fruitfull, and full of good paſtures, and haue many trees which yeelde Balſamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Riuers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the Riuer Iaboc: Others doe alſo fancie another Riuer, which riſing out of the Rockes of Arnon, falleth into Iordan.

Of the Ammonites, part of whoſe Territories the Gadites wanne from Og the King of Baſan.

THis Tribe of Gad poſſeſt halfe the Countrie of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petræa called Nabathea, as well within as without the mountaines of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wanne it, it was in the poſſeſſion of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moſes did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thruſt the iſſues of Lot ouer the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the firſt Iudge of Iſrael, the Ammonites ioyned with the Moabites againſt the Hebrewes, and ſo continued long. Iephta Iudge of Iſrael had a great conqueſt ouer one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them againe.

Iud. 10.

Afterward wee finde that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nahas: who beſieging Iabes Gilead, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reaſon why he tendred ſo hard a compoſition, was (beſides this deſire to bring ſhame

This Nahas, as it may ſeeme, became the confederate of Dauid, hauing friended him in Sauls time, though Ioſephus thinkes that this Nahas was ſlaine in the battaile, when Saul raiſed the ſiege of Iabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanun ſucceeded Nahas: to whom when Dauid ſent to congratulate his eſtabliſhment, and to confirme the former friendſhip which he had with his Father, he moſt contemptuouſly and proudly cut off the Ambaſſadours garments to the knees, and ſhaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithſtanding the aydes receiued from the Aramites ſubiect to Adadezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Iſtob, yet all thoſe Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouer-turned: their chiefe Citie of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken; the Crowne which weighed a talent of gold was ſet on Dauids head; all ſuch as were priſoners, Dauid executed with ſtrange ſeuerity; for with Sawes and Harrowes hee tare them in pieces, and caſt the reſt into Lime-kils.

The fift King of the Ammonites, of whoſe name we reade, was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechia: after whoſe taking by Nabuchodonoſor, Baalis ſent Iſmael of the bloud of the Kings of Iuda, to ſlay Gedaliah, who ſerued Nabuchodonoſor.

Of the other halfe of Manaſſe.

THe reſt of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdome of Og in Baſan, with the Land of Hus, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein alſo were part of the ſmall Territories of * Batania, Gaulonitis, Geſſuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was giuen to the halfe Tribe of Manaſſe ouer Iordan, of which thoſe three latter Prouinces defended themſelues againſt them, for many ages. But Batanea Ptolomie ſetteth farther off, and to the North-Eaſt, as a skirt of Arabia the Deſart: and all thoſe other Prouinces before named with Petræa, and Ituræa, he nameth but as part of Cœloſyria; as farre South as Rabba or Philadelphia: likewiſe all the reſt which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, ſauing the Land neere the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petræa: for many of theſe ſmall Kingdomes take not much more ground then the County of Kent.

* Another territory adioyning to Manaſſe, whoſe limits were confounded with ſome of theſe, was that Thiſbhitis, the country of Elias, as it is the 1 Kin. 16. 1. & of Tobias, Tob. 1. 2. it lay on the Eaſt to the tribe of Neph. on the right hand of it, as in Tob. 1. 2 & was poſſeſt by Colonies of the Iſraelites in the time of Saul after his victory ouer the Amalekites & Iſmaelites in thoſe parts, as it is gathered out of the 1 Chr 5. 10. whence it appears that it was part of Ituræa, of which chap. 7. §. 4. †. 5. and 6.

Baſan, or after the Septuagint, Baſanitis, ſtretcheth it ſelfe from the Riuer of Iaboc to the [a] Machati and Geſſuri: and from the Mountaines to Iordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reaſon whereof it abounded in all ſorts of Cattell. It had alſo the goodlieſt Woods of all that part of the world: eſpecially of Oakes, which beare maſt (of which the Prophet Zacharias, Howle, O yee Oakes of Baſhan) and by reaſon hereof they bred ſo many Swine, as [b] 2000. in one Herd were carried head-long into the Sea, by the vncleane ſpirits which Chriſt had caſt out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it threeſcore Cities walled and defenced: all which, after Og and his ſonnes were ſlaine, Iair, deſcended of Manaſſe, conquered, and called the Countrie after his owne name, Auoth Iair, or the Cities of Iair.

The principall Cities of this halfe Tribe (for I will omit the reſt) are theſe; Pella ſometimes [c] Butis, otherwiſe Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is ſaid to haue beene called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Sonne Alexander the Great were borne. It was taken, and in part demoliſhed by Alexander Iannæus King of the Iewes: becauſe it refuſed to obey the Iewes lawes: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Gouernement of Syria. It is now but a Village, ſaith Niger. Carnaim by the Riuer of Iaboc, taken by [d] Iudas Maccabæus: where he Iabes Gilead, or Iabesus, was another of the Cities of this halfe Tribe, which being besieged by Nahas [h] King of the Ammonites, was deliuered by Saul, as is elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens [k] recouered, embalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his Sonnes: which hung despightfully ouer the wals of Bethsan or Scythopolis. [l] Gaddara or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Plinie on a Hill neere the Riuer Hieromiace, which Riuer Ortelius seemes to thinke to be Iaboc. At the foote of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Macharus. Alexander Iannæus after ten moneths siege wan it, and subuerted it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinius [m] made it one of the fiue Courts of Iustice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath or Amathus the third, Hierico, and Sephora in Galilee, the fourth and fift. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonita, accused him to Iulius Cæsar of many crimes: but perceiuing that they could not preuaile, and that Herod was highly fauoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible [n] reuenge of Herod, they slew themselues: some by strangling, others by leaping ouer high Towers, others by drowning themselues.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei, [o] in which, Iosephus ant. 5.13. saith Iephtha was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Iud. 12.7. Sepultus est in Ciuitate sua Gilehad, (for in vna Ciuitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the name of a Citie, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 2 Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chesbon; the same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilehaditarum Ciuitas: so of one Citie Hesbon or Chesbon, which they call Essebon, the chiefe Citie of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, hee imagineth two more: this Casphor in Manasses, and a Citie in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we haue admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the backe of a Cammell) which Iosephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis ouer against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Iosephus in the fourth booke of the Iewish warre: where hee describes the place by nature to be almost inuincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his owne person, entring it, was at first repulsed, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping downe the rockes with their wiues and children, to the number of fiue thousand, thus perished: besides foure thousand slaine by the Romans: so that none escaped, saue onely two women that hid themselues.

Cap. 1. & 3.

About foure miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other-side of the Lake) Iosephus placeth Hippus or Hippene, whence Ptolomie giues the name to the hils that compasse the plaines in which it standeth: so that it may seeme to haue beene of no small note. It is seated farre from the hill Countrie: on the East of the Lake, as also Plinie noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herods Tetrarchie. It was wasted by the Iewes, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were inraged against their borderers.

The next Citie of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrehi or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel inuaded him: and neere vnto this his Regall Citie, it was that he lost the battaile and his life. It stood in S. Hierome time: and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not farre from these Townes neere Iordan, in this valley stood Gerasa or Gergesa, inhabited by the Gergesites, descended of the fift sonne of Canaan. Of these Gergesites wee reade Mat. 8.28. that Christ comming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where casting the Diuels out of the possessed, hee permitted them to enter into the herd of Hogges: in which storie, for Gergesites or Gergesins, S. Luke and S. Marke haue Gadarens: not as if these were all one (for Geryessa or Gerasa is a distinct Towne in these parts from Gadera) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This Citie receiued many changes and calamities: of which Iosephus hath often mention.

tion. For besides other aduentures, it was taken by L. Annius Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the yeere 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same yeere recouered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Hierusalem: and by him vterly razed. Neere vnto Gerasa is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriake Magedu, or after the Greeke Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Sauiour a signe from heauen: the same place or some adioyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumstances of which storie it appeares that this coast lay betweene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countrie of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one; and findes it to be Phiale, the fountaine of Iordan according to Iosephus: but this Phiale is too farre from the Sea to of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appeares by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Desart of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the fiue Barley loaues and two Fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida they place Iulias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Iulia, the wife of Tiberius, called Iulias, as hath beene farther spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Iulias, to be the same as Bethsaida. Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Mat. 10 thew; Woe be vnto thee Corazin.

Iosep.18.ant.3. & alibi.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrie adioyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og, King of Basan. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 *Mac.*5.26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios. 13.21. it is called Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Astoreth, which was the Image of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Astaroth in Deuteronomie signifieth sheepe. Others from the ambiguitie of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to haue beene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphei which inhabited 30 this Citie (*Gen.*14.5.) were Giant-like men, as appeares by comparing the words Deut. 3.11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words, Ios. 13.12. Og ex reliquijs Raphaaorum: but if the Karnaim (or Carnaim) were these Raphei, the word would not haue beene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis haue said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphei in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for perspicuitie: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

* Because Horne when it is polished shineth: hence it is that the Verbe of this Nown is sometime Lucere: as it were corneum esse: whereupon the Vulgar, *Exod.*34.29. reading cornutam corneam, or lucidam faciem, gaue occasion to the fabulous painters to paint Moses with Hornes. Iudith.1.8. 1 Cant.5.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazin. This Citie (saith he) is remembred in the Canticles, and in the booke of Iudith, and there are that of this Citie 40 vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and here the Sepulchre of Iob is yet to be seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vse in that place of Iudith, and ioyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scenita Cedareni, it is apparent, and as euident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolores, much more than any vnder the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petraa, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) 50 faine many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historicall circumstances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countrie seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countrie was, and build vnto him a Citie by coniecture.

Of Iob himselfe, whether he was the same Iobab remembred in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esau, and King also of Idumaa, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, and Bellarmine are of another opinion, yet S. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with with Athanasius, Hippolitus, Irænæus, Eusebius Emissenus, Apollinaris, Eustachius and other, cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Euagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Huts or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke οὖς, which the Septuagint vse for the word Huts, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1. v. 1. sometime Ausitis, as Hierem. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palæstina and Cœlesyria, besides Chamatha (or Hamath) vnder Palmyrene in the Country called by Ptolomie Trachonitis or Bathanæa, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Basan in this halfe Tribe of Manasses. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where he reckons the Hushites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom hee therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneam turbam, because their bounds were not onely ioyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Hieremy, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same propheſie, of which hee speaketh in the fiue and twentieth Chapter, must needes be expounded: as Iunius reades them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, ô quæ habitas in terra Hutzi; O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth Filiæ Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as we haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by it Idumæa or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Edumæa. For it is very probable that Esau when he first parted from Iacob, did not seate himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Iudæa, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Iordan, and held a part of those Mountaines otherwise called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir for Seir; and from this his habitation did Esau incounter Iacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esau his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandred in the Desarts, that the posterity of Esau inhabited Seir to the South of Iudæa: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also driue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence-forward seated themselues to the South of Iudæa, bordering the Desart Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Desarts as farre as Hor where Aaron died. Deut. 3. 9.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue beene lost: and partly because in Iob c. 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iobs friends, which seemes to be of Iobs owne Countrey, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Hieremie 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named betweene) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our coniecture, that in the place of Iob 32. Elihu the Buzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Sem, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke; where he saith that one of Iobs friends (which must beedes be this Elihu) was of the posteritie of Nachor (as also in this place hee confesseth so much expresly,) and in as much as he readeth not è familiâ Aram, or Ram, but è familia Syriæ; like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian. Whence the Septuagint call him ex regione Ausitide.

As for the other three of Iobs friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Familie, or of the Family of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindreds; as also by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ausitis, it is implied that they thought onely Elihu to haue beene of Iobs owne Countrie. See Sixtus Senensis.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the iournie from Acon Eastward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of the which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the Shuchits were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shuach the sonne of Abraham and Ketura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie cals Saccæi. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom

For u and o are often changed one into the other: whence they vsed Ausitis for Ousitis, &c. Hence also by Iunius and others it is called Ausanitis, and so as it seems they read it in the Septuagint. Iun. in Gen. 10. 23.

Eliphaz was, to haue beene of Arabia the Desart: and Eliphaz himselfe to haue beene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Esau. And so also Nahamah, whence Tsophar the third of Iobs friends (which in this place of Iob 6.2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned expositor, thought either to be named of Thimnath by transposition of letters (which Thimnah, *Gen.*36.40. is named among the sonnes of Esau that gaue denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nahamah, which *Ios.*15.41. is reckoned for a Citie of Iuda in the border, as he thinkes, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that neere the Land of Hus, in Basan, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manasses, there is a Region which at least in later times was called Suitii, or of some like name. For this is euident by the Historie of Willielmus Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he cals it diuersly) of exceeding great strength and vse for the retaining of the whole Countrie: which, in the time of Baldwine the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rockes recouered by the Christians: hauing not long before beene lost to the great disaduantage of the Countrey, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrius described to be sixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Iordan: by Adrichomius foure miles North-ward from the place where Iordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

De Bell Sacr. l. 22. c. 15. & 21.

Other Cities of this part of Manasses named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Beheshthera, Mitspa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the comming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitspa of Gilead, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis superior and inferior; oft in Iosephus. Beheshthera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basan by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betser or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hieron. hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Iosua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Iosephus cals it. This Lake being as it were in the midst betweene Cæsarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Iordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more contract, leauing the marish ground on both sides, for Lyons and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

*Ios.*21.27. *Deut.*4.43.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Country of Manasses, Iosephus names two places of strength, fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Iewes rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauran, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West; of which three Cities we read *Ezek.*47.15. with which also agrees the place *Numb.*34.8. where for Chauram, between Tsedad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Aurunitis regio, in Iosephus and Tyrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Maachath or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses toward the North-east) are vnknowne: onely that Gessur was of might, it appeares in that Dauid married Maacha the Daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautifull, but wicked, and vnfortunate Absalon.

CHAP. XI.

The Historie of the Syrians the chiefe borderers of the Israelites that dwelt on the East of Iordan.

§. I.

Of the Citie of Damascus, and the diuers fortunes thereof.

Damascus of all other in this Border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beautie, antiquitie, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnesse; and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith Iosephus, thinke it to haue beene built by Hus the sonne of Aram: of which opinion

Ioseph 1.24.

S. Hie-

S. Hierome vpon Eſai ſeemeth to be: though in his Hebrew queſtions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damaſcus, the ſonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward; a thing very vnlikely, ſeeing the Citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appeares by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damaſco. Dauid was the firſt that ſubiected it to the Kingdome of Iuda, after the ouerthrow of Adadezer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recouered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principalitie: but Dauid hauing ouerthrowne Hadadezer king of Sophena (otherwiſe Syria Soba or Zobah) Razon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, inuaded Damaſcena, and poſſeſt Damaſcus it ſelfe, and became an enemie to Salomon all his life. In Iſai 17. Gen.15.2. 1 Reg.11.v.40

The next King of Damaſcus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Ægypt from Dauid and Ioab, when they ſlew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Ægypts wiues ſiſter: of whom Taphnes in Ægypt was ſo called. This Adad returning againe, became an enemie to Salomon all his life, and (as ſome writers affirme) inuaded Damaſcus, and thruſt Rezon thence-out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine deſcents (as hereafter may be ſhewed in the catalogue of thoſe Kings of Syria) to whom the Aſſyrians and then the Gracians ſucceeded. This Citie was exceeding ſtrong, compaſſed with waters from the riuers of Abanah, and Parphar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chryſorrhoas the golden riuer. Iunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitfull of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very ſtrong Caſtle, built as it ſeemes by the Florentines, after it became Chriſtian: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that Citadell. Againſt this Citie the Prophets Amos, Eſai, Hieremie and Zacharias, prophecied that it ſhould be taken, burnt, demoliſhed, and made a heape of ſtones. In the time of the laſt Rezon and tenth King of the Damaſcens, Teglatphalaſſar inuited by Achaz King of Iuda, carried away the naturals of Damaſcus into the Eaſt: leauing of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was vtterly ruined by the Babylonians, ſaith Hierome vpon Eſai: which thing was performed by Salmanaſar, according to Iunius in his note vpon that place, fiue yeeres after the Prophecie. In time it was reſtored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Chriſtians it had an Archbiſhop: S. Hierome liuing, as hee affirmeth vpon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Sarazens: being taken by Haomar their King from the Romanes, in the yeere of our redemption 636. And in the yeere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewes King of Fraunce, Baldwine the third King of Hieruſalem, Henry Duke of Auſtria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbaroſſa afterward Emperour, Theodorick Earle of Flaunders, and other Princes aſſembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the ſea coaſt, determined to recouer Damaſcus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize. 2 Reg.5. *Herold.& Bell. In the yeere 1262. Halon the Tartar incompaſt it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the wals, and threatned extreame torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refuſing it, the King was torne aſunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the ſonne of Halon was by his father made King thereof. Herold. Bell. Sac.4 c.14.

In the yeere 1400. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, inuaded that region, and beſieged the Citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not miſtaken.) He entred it, and put all to the ſword, filling the ditch with his priſoners; thoſe that retired into the Caſtle which ſeemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Caſtle adioyning: hee forbare the demoliſhing of the Citie in reſpect of the beauty of the Church, garniſhed with 40. gates or ſumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lanternes of gold and ſiluer: but while he inuaded Ægypt, they againe ſurprized Damaſcus. Laſtly, in his returne after three moneths ſiege hee forſt it: the Mahometans proſtrating themſelues with their prieſts, deſired mercie: But Tamberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did ſo demoliſh it, as thoſe that came afterwards to ſee their houſes, knew them not by the foundarions. And as a Trophey of his victorie hee raiſed three Towers with great Art, builded with the heads of thoſe whom hee had ſlaughtered. After this it was reſtored and repoſſeſt by the Soldane of Ægypt, with a garriſon of Mammalukes: And in the yeere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wreſted it out of the hands of the Ægyptians: Herold l.6 c.4.

in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans, and Christians, of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing vp of their power.

NOw be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Dauids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Iudges, as impertinent to that Storie: But were it so that it had some reguli, or petty Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadezer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubæi, inhabiting betweene Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land, there were three chiefe principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syria Zoba, and Tohu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adadezer when Dauid inuaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were leuied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadezer, Rezon, the Commander of his armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadezer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Tohu King of Chamath or Ituræa, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadezer was vtterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dolo saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Iudæans and Israelites. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I meane of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Ituræa, to which I may adde Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract:) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

1 Reg. 11.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing inuaded that Region, and left Ioab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seede, fled into Ægypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before; who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Ioab (whom indeede all the bordering Nations feared) he turned againe, and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, Adadezer the sonne of Rehob, whom Saul inuaded, was the founder of that Principalitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grew powerfull, tooke vpon him the style of Adad, the great god of the Assyrians, saith Macrobius, which signified oneneſſe or Vnitie, I also finde a Citie called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which, whether these Princes took the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid vndertooke the warre: secondly, because hee leuied 22000. Aramites out of the Territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name; thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desart as far as to Euphrates, according to Plinie:

and

and the greatest part of Arabia Petræa, according to Niger. Whosoeuer was the first, whether Adadezer, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemie to Israel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the euill that Adad did, the euill that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Ægypt: to wit, 23. yeeres after he was carried thither. 1 Reg. 11.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmum, or Tabremmum; to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings; For Asa King of Iuda the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Salomon, being vexed & inuaded by Baasha, the successour of Nadab, the son of Ieroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon the sonne of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to inuade Israel (while Baasha sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to block him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, hauing receiued his presents, willingly inuaded the Countrie of Nepthalim, and tooke diuers Cities, and spoiles thence: Asa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasha had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vse. 1 King. 15. 18. 1 Reg. 15. 17. 18

This Benhadads Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon inuaded Israel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father tooke from thy Father, I will restore: and thou shalt make streetes or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeede to Benhadad which inuaded Baasha, at the request of Asa; But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betweene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Baashas time, and the siege of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the reignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when he inuaded Baasha, and after that 49. yeeres ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is vnlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolue, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon inuaded Baasha and Omri; and Benhadad the second inuaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samaria, by a sally of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crusht by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom he rendreth those townes that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being deliuered, Achab inuaded Gilead, and assiegeth the Citie, being assisted by Iosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Naaman, to Ioram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from heauen, he departeth home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might liue. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: Amos and Hieremie mention the towres of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that Benhadad and his successour Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the presumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeares are compleate since their warres with the Israelites. 1 Reg. 20. 1 Reg. 22. 3227. 3232. 2 Reg. 5. 2 Reg. 6. 2 Reg. 6. 2 Reg. 7. 3234. Amos 1 Hier. 49. Ant. l. 8. c. 8.

Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Elisha, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad hadad ſhould recouer his preſent ſickeneſſe: He waged warre with Ioram; who receiued diuers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Ieſreel, he and the King of Iuda, Ahaziah, or Ochozias, are ſlaine by Iehu, as before is ſaid. After the death of Ioram, Azael continued the warre againſt Iehu, and waſted Gilead, and all thoſe portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manaſſe, ouer Iordan. He then inuaded Iuda, and tooke Gath, but by gifts from Ioas he was auerted from attempting Hieruſalem: for he preſented him all the hallowed things which Iehoſaphat, Iehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Iuda had dedicated; and which he himſelfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treaſuries of the Lord, and in the Kings houſe. This was the ſecond time that the Temple was ſpoyled to pleaſe the Adads of Damaſcus. For Aſa did preſent Benhadad with thoſe treaſures, when he inuited him to warre vpon Baaſha King of Iſrael. And notwithſtanding this compoſition betweene Ioas and Azael, yet a part of his Armie ſpoiled the other Prouinces of Iudæa, and ſlaughtered many principall perſons. Laſtly, Azael vexed Ioahas the ſonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitie, as he left him but fifty horſemen, ten Chariots, & ten thouſand footemen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the latter Kings, and decay and ouerthrow of their power.

AFter Hazael, Benhadad the ſecond, or rather the third of that name, the ſonne of Hazael, reigned in Damaſcus: who fought againſt Iſrael, with ill ſucceſſe: for Ioas King of Iſrael, the ſonne of the vnhappy Ioachaz, as hee was foretold by Eliſha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three ſeuerall battels: and hee loſt all thoſe Cities to Iſrael, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from Ioachaz.

2 Reg. 13. Ioſeph. ant. l. 9. c. 9.

After this Benhadad the ſonne of Hazael, there ſucceeded three others by the ſame name, of whom the Stories are loſt, onely Nicholaus Damaſcenus cited by Ioſephus, makes mention of them: and in one of theſe Kings times it was that Ieroboam the ſecond, the ſonne of Ioas recouered Damaſcus it ſelfe, to Iudah, ſaith the Geneua, but better in Iunius, vtque recuperabat Damaſcum, & Chamatham Iehuda pro Iſraele; that is, And how he recouered for Iſrael, Damaſcus and Chamatha of Iudea; for theſe Cities ſometimes conquered by Dauid, did of right belong to the Tribe of Iuda.

Ioſeph. Ant. l. 7. c. 6. 2 Reg. 14. 28.

And it is likely that this conqueſt vpon the Adads was performed: the firſt of theſe three Adads then liuing, of whom there is no Story. For when as Iehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice ouercome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the ſonne of Hazael, and had recouered the Cities which Hazael had won from Iſrael; and ſo left his Kingdome to his ſonne Ieroboam the ſecond, it ſeemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and hauing nothing elſe left for him to enterprize, inſtantly followed his fathers good fortune, and inuaded Damaſcus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Ioſephus Raſes, after Zonaras Raaſon, the 10. Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacas King of Iſrael, againſt Achaz King of Iuda; both carry away a great number of priſoners. After this they both beſiege Achaz in Hieruſalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone inuadeth Elath, and bearing out the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought Tetglaphalaſſar againſt Razin, who tooke him, and beheaded him, and won Damaſcus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdome of Damaſcus: the Aſſyrians becomming maſters both of that and Iſrael. Theſe Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

2 King. 16. 5. 5. Eſay 7. Ioſeph. Ant. l. 9. c. 11.

1 Adadezer the ſonne of Rehob.
2 Rezin the ſonne of Eliadad, or Razin.
3 Hezion.
4 Tabremmon.
5 Benhadad, who inuaded Baaſha.
6 Benhadad the ſecond, taken priſoner by Achab.
7 Hazael, whom Eliſha foretold, with teares, of his aduancement; the ſame who ouerthrew Ioram King of Iſrael, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a ſecond Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, becauſe that Hazael which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with Ioas, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more,

more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Ioas began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazael that tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murthered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth, the second person in the kingdome, and Commander of Benhadads men of warre. To this Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded:

8. Benhadad the third, whom Ioash King of Israel thrise ouerthrew.

9. Resin or Rezin the last, who ioyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Iuda, at which time Achaz King of Iuda waged for his defence Teglatphalasser.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicolaus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we finde that Tohu was King of Emath or Chamath in Dauids time, to whom he sent his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauids victory against Adadezer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not. 2. Sam. 8. Esai. 37.

§. IIII.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought vnder the Assyrians, neuer recouered themselues againe.

OF Gessur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his Father Ammihur. To Talmai, whose daughter Dauid married, it was that Absalon fledde, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sophena or Syria, Soba or Cœlosyria, there are two named, Rehob or Rechob the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himselfe; and it is plaine that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with Dauid, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Israel. For Ahaz King of Iuda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglath first inuaded Damascena, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem gouerning Israel) who stopt the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phal Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his seate at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: hauing besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglath following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betweene Israel and Iudah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Iuda, his impreste and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, hee carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possest himselfe of the Cities of Nephthalim, leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanasser, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabonassar, after the reuolt of Hosea, forced Samaria, and rent thet Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglath slaughtered; the Kingdome of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanasser ouerturned; happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalasser, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Iuda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolued, Achaz yet liuing.

Lastly, the Kingdome of Iuda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserued for the time by God miracnlously, was at length

vtterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeres after the captiuity of Israel, and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeere of Hosea: that of Iuda in the eleuenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeere of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom 3603. Herodotus calleth Labynitus: in all about 200. yeeres. After these the Persians from Cy- 3811. rus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeeres.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucidæ reigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romanes, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering vpon the Israelites, with whom they had most to doe both in warre and peace, being the onely people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of trueth.

OF THE TRIBE OF BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibha.

OF the Tribe of Beniamin, the twelfth and yongest sonne of Iacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 45600. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Territory on this side Iordan, betweene Iuda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neerest Iordan, are Lod, Haded, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Beniamite: they were all three re-inhabited with Beniamites, after the returne out of Captiuitie, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Esd. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a Citie called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Macchabæus.

1. Macc. 12. 38.

Samarim or Tsemaraim, named of Tsemary, one of the sonnes of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Iericho, one of the Toparchies, and the last of Iuda, seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palme trees: and therefore elsewhere called the citie of Palmes. From the time of Iosua, who vtterly destroyed it, it lay waste vntill the time of Achab: in whose dayes Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his yongest sonne Segub: according to the curse of Iosua: in which and other respects, Hos. 12. 14. calleth Iosua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

1. Reg. 17. 36. Ios 6. 25.

* 1. Chron. 6. 60 This Halmō is called Halemeth, whence they make a new Citie Almath, as if this Tribe had giuen fiue Cities to the Leuites.

To the Southeast of Iericho stood * Halmon of the Leuites, of which Ios. 21. 18. To the South Betharaba, of which Ios. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Iosua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Desarts, and celebrated the Passeouer.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the comming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Ios. 5. 9. Ob deuolutionem probri Ægyptiaci, because their fore-skinnes (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Collis præputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appeares by comparing the places, Ios. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Iordan, of which Ios. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two * Hils Garazim and Hebal: vpon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Beniamin (of which also wee reade oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason [a] Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yeerly to giue iudgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was neere Iordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitspa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

a 1.Sam 7.15

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vsed yeerely to come, is [b] Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past ouer Iordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-ieharim, and at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Iosua pitched vp the twelue stones, which were taken out of the channell of Iordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it: by which Storie, as it is set down *Ios.*4. it appeares, that the same day that they passed ouer Iordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yeerely to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibha, and the Beniamites, *Iud.*20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1.*Sam.*7.12. Thither also Iudas Maccabaus gathered the Iewes, (when Hierusalem was possest by the Heathen) as it is 1. Macc. 3.47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus Orationi fuerat Mispe anteà Israeli. Touching this Mitspa, to auoid confusion, it is to be remembred, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mitspa of Iuda, of which *Ios.*15.38. [c] Mitspa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mitspa of the Moabites, where Dauid for a while held himselfe, commending his Parents to the King of Moab. 1. *Sam.*22.3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitspa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recouered from the Iebusites, and also in the time of the Maccabees (as wee haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldeys, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Iewry, as Gouernour ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Iewes) hee was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall bloud of Iuda, as it is Hierem. 41.

b Iunius in this place, for Bethel reads Domũ Dei fortis, and interprets it, Kiriath-ieharim where the Ark abode. For (saith he) by the Law, Exo.23.17. the greatest meetings in their annuall feasts were to bee, where the Ark was, but this place doth not speake of festiuall, but of iudiciall meetings: and besids the Priests did vse to bring the Arke to their great meetings whersoeuer they were, as appears 1.Sam 12.v.11 &c. 14.v.18. neither is it easie to expoũd Bethel otherwise then for the Citie Bethel: though Iunius also take it for the place where the Ark was, 1. Sam. 10.3.

c It was no other than this Mitspa of Gilead, of which *Ios.*11.8. as appeares by that which is added Versus orientẽ, for Iosua notes the three quarters, North, West, & East, to which hee followed the Canaanites, though Adrichomius and others out of this place imagine a Mitspa or Maspha (as they write it) in the Tribe of Asser.

Neere vnto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Ioseph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is Nehem. 11.31. and *Ios.*18.22.) and how another Citie called Luz [d] neere adioyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is *Iudg.*1. and of the occasion of the name from Iacobs vision: and how Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calues heere, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it [e] Beth-auen, that is, the house of Vanitie, *Hos.*4.15. and 10.5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well knowne, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them ouer.

e Borrowing the name of a neighbour towne in the

The territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Asa against Ieroboam (of which 2.Chron. 13.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdome of Iuda: and so it continued, as appeares by the Storie of Iosias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2.*Reg.*23. whence those coasts 1.*Macc.*11.34. are called Apherema, which Greeke word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories or Praefectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Iewes, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appeares 2.Chron. 13.19. was Hephrauin, which *Ios.*18.23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned [e] confines of the Kingdomes of Iuda and Israel betweene Hai and Bethel. Ios 7.2. and 18.12.

in

in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibha, and Gebah. Of the name Rama, [b] it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many townes so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they finde out Rama in the Tribe of Iuda (as it seemes because Mat.2. it appeares that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to haue beene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three haue no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seemes, wee haue testimonie, Ios.19.29. and of another in Nephthalim, Ios.19.36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1.Sam.25.1. which more often is called [c] Ramatha, and 1.Sam.1.1. Ramathaim Tsophim: for which the Septuagint haue Aramathaim-sophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke to Ioseph of Arimathaa, Mat.27.57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we reade 2.Reg.8.29. which is Ramoth in Gilehad. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, seated as we said, neere Bethel the vttermost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Baasha in the time of Asa King of Iuda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flie from him to Asa. Of this Rama or Ramatha I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because it was neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuity belonged to Iudaa, as it appeares Esd.2.26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plaine that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Baasha had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1.Reg.25.22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Iuda: whence 2.Reg.23.8. wee reade that Iosiah through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibha which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Iudges had almost vtterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are euidently distinguished Esai.10.27. of which word [d] Gibha, in another forme Gibbath, hee imagineth Gibbaath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this citie also to Rama of Beniamin, appeares Iud.19.13. where the Leuite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took vp his lodging at Gibha. By that place of 1.Sam.22.6. it seemes that there was in this Gibha some towre or Citadell called Rama: where Iunius reades in excelso, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings palace in this citie, was Rama: as it seemes that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Naioth. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Ios. which Ios.7.2. is placed neere Beth-auen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Nehe.7.10.30. though it be not named by Iosua c.18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Ios.8.28. In solitudinem in tumulum perpetuum; Another Citie of chiefe note is reckoned Ios.18.25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to saue their liues, is set downe Ios.9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinai or Proselites: and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of sauing these Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2.Sam.21.1. This Gibeon or Gibbon with Almon and Iebah (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Ios.21.28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appeares 1.Reg.2.26. where Ebiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehem.9.31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriath-iearim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1.Sam.21. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe Nehem.9.31. was a place of fame, of which Esai.10.28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migron in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Campe, 1.Sam.13.2. (when he left Gibha to Ionathan) and there also was Ionathan Macchabaus his aboad, 1.Macc.9.73. Of Giscala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any heere in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he sailed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, & come to the Citie of Hierusalem, and the Princes

c Of this Ramatha I vnderstand the place 1. Mace. 11.34. where it is named for one of the 3. Praefectures which Demetrius yeelds to the Iewes out of the country of Samaria, this lying toward the East to Iericho: and Lydda toward the West: and Apharema (of which euen now wee spake) lying in the middest betweene the two other. A sixt Rama it seemes there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which Ios.19.8. is called Rama of the South, and otherwise Baalath-beer.

d Gibha in cõstruction, that is, Goueming a genitiue case is Gibhath: whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint read Ios.24.33 Gabbath Phinees: for which Iunius hath Collis Phinees: (for this word is oft times an Appellatine signifying a Hil) but Adricomius taking notice of this, builds his City Gabaath vpon this Text and placeth it in Beniamin, when as the words adioyned, note that this Hil was in the mountains of Ephraim.

* The word Nethinim, or Nethinai, is as much as dati (as it were a Deo dati) or as Iunius expounds it, dedititij, it is vsed, 1.chr.9.2. and in Esdras and Nehemias often,

Princes and Gouernours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Beniamin, whence Ios. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

AT what time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But * according to others, that Citie out of which Melchisedec incountred Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the riuer of Iordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima. * See in the hither halfe of Manasse.

Hierusalem (whensoeuer or by whomsoeuer built) was a principall Citie in Iosua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Iosua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusæi (the children of Iebusæus the sonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it. 2. Sam. 5. v. 6.

Dauid, after he had by Gods assistance possest it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebussalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolyma. After Dauids time Salomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walles, could not any where in the world be exampled: and besides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rocke: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldome beene heard of, either since or before. Ios cont. App l. 1. Strab. geog. l. 16.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut asunder, Shishac King of Ægypt, and his predecessor, hauing bred vp for that purpose, Adad the Idumean, and Ieroboam, Salomons seruant; and both married to Ægyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishac first inuaded the Territorie of Iuda, entred Hierusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all those spoyles which Dauid had gotten from Adadezer, Tohu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe sackt, and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ioas King of Israel; while Amasia the twelfth King thereof gouerned Iuda. 2. Chron. 12. 2. Kings 14. 2. Kings 16.

Not long after Achaz the fifteenth King of Iuda impouerished the Temple, and presented Teglatphalassar with the treasures thereof. And Manasses the sonne of Ezekiah, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Merodach, lost the remaine, and the very bottome of their treasures. It was againe spoyled by the Babylonians, Ioakim then reigning. But this vngratefull, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the City euen to the mouth with innocent bloud, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers which imbraced them, euen and leuell with the dust, carried away the spoyles with the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heauie yoake of bondage and seruitude full seuentie yeeres, insomuch as Sion was not onely become as a torne and plowed-vp field, Hierusalem an heape of stone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briers, but (as Hierome speaketh) euen the birds of the ayre scorned to flie ouer it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soyle. 1. Chron. 5. 26. 2. King 25. 2. King 19. 2. Par. 18. Mich. 3. Hier. 25. 26. 29.

Then 70 yeeres being expired, according to the Propheeie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie Hier. to 3. trad. Heb.

difficultie enough: and the Citie meanely inhabited, and without walls or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeeres, till Nehemia by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them.

Nehem. 12. 34. &c.

Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoyled by Bagoses, or Vagoses, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomæus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crassus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spared.

* The first of the Egyptian Kings after Alexander Macedon, who dissembling his Religion came vp to Hierusalem to offer Sacrifice. Ios. 12. Ant. 1.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberalitie of strangers. Before the captiuity, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bountie of his sonne Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The mischiefe wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that vsurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that hee left them farre more stately and glorious than they had beene in the dayes of Salomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Ierusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the comming of our Sauiour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeeres. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Iewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Iewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Passeouer: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreame famine, with the ciuill dissension, oppressed them within the walles; a forcible enemie assailed them without. The Idumæans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Iewes Kingdome, thrust themselues into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victory, eleuen hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleeue that there had beene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towres (works most magnificent, and ouer-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour bee the greater and more shining, that there-ouer became victorious.

Esd. 1. c 4. v. 45.

After this, such Iewes as were scattered heere and there in Iudea, and other Prouinces, began againe to inhabite some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to reuolt, and rebell, Ælius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towres, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one Stone vpon another, of that vngratefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulcher of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Ælia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, hee caused a Sowe to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which he did in despight of the Iewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth euer enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palastina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres. Gul. Tir. Bel. Sa. l. 14. c. 12.

It was afterward in the 636. yeare after Christ, taken by the Ægyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeeres. Onuphrius Chro.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recouery, it remained vnder the successors of Godfrey fourescore and eight yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Ægypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes cast out the Ægyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbaree, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Ierusalem alone that hath so oftentimes beene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World haue with their inhabitants, in seuerall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath beene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impietie of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slauerie; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possest; of the walls and buildings, yea of the soyle and the beasts that fedde thereon. G. Tir. l. 1. c. 18. 19. &c.

For, euen that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertilitie, and fruitfulnesse; witnesse the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the daies of the Kings of Iuda and Israel; it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barraine. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe; neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned; but that his moueables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Iewes.

OF the originall of the Iewes, prophane writers haue conceiued diuersly and iniuriously. Quintilian speakes infamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernitious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Ægyptians. Others affirme that while Isis gouerned Ægypt, the people were so increased, as Ierosolymus, and Iudas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidentall, because he was taken vp and saued out of the waters. But Iustine of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Iewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among whom he diuided the land of Iuda; so called of Iudas his eldest; who had the greatest portion. The yongest of the sonnes of Israel he calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in Ægypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Ioseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Ægypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreame thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seauenth day, for this cause euer after obserued the seuenth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselues, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discouering their vncleanesse, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Ægyptians. These and the like fables hath Iustine. Iustin. l. 36.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grosly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the fifth booke of his owne Historie truely confessed of the Iewes, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Iudas with Idumæa, the first parents of the Iewes.

Cited by Stephanus in Iudæa.

Claudius Iolaus drawes them from Iudæus, whose parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kindred of the Hebrewes: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports seeme to haue beene gathered out of diuine letters; though wrested and peruerted, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and akered the Storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Floud; and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes: all which fainings, as touching the Iewes and their originalls, Iosephus against Appion, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originallie, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greeke Grammarian, deriue the Hebrewes or Iewes, from Arabon; hauing mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Iacob, otherwise Israel, the chiefe part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Iacob, being most of the Tribe of Iuda, honoured the name of Iudas, the sonne of Iacob, and became Iudæans or Iewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the tenne Tribes, the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Iudæans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

Tert. in Apol.

Caleb. f. 63.

The gouernement which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Ægyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and Leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselues to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before we intreat, we are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Iosua to the Warre of Troy: which was about the time of Iephtha.

§. I.

Of the inter-regnum after Iosua's death: and of Othoniel.

When Iosua was now dead, who with the aduice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Iuda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to vndertake the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew tenne thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants crueltie, as elsewhere hath beene signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious cious imagination) made him confeſſe and acknowledge Gods iudgements againſt himſelfe.

The tribes of Iuda and Simeon did alſo maſter and poſſeſſe during this interregnum (or as ſome thinke, before the death of Ioſua) the Cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron and Hieruſalem, which they burnt, and the Iebuſites after reedified. They tooke alſo the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathſepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not ſet downe in expreſſe words that any one perſon commanded in chiefe ouer the people, as Moſes and Ioſua did: yet it ſeemeth that Caleb was of greateſt authority among them: and that he with the aduice of Phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chiefe, the good ſucceſſe which followed their vndertakings witneſſeth the contrary. And it was Caleb euen while Ioſua gouerned, as appeares, Ioſ. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the reſt of the Captaines: for the performance of which enterpriſe, hee promiſed his Daughter Achſah: which he performed to Othoniel his yonger brother after the conqueſt: whoſe behauiour in that ſeruice was ſuch, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greateſt reputation among them, and may be eſteemed the ſecond cauſe of his preferment and election for their firſt Iudge ſoone after. But, while thoſe of Iuda made warre with their borderers, from whom they onely recouered the mountainous Countries (for they could not driue out the inhabitants of the Valleyes, becauſe they had Chariots of yron.) Iud. 1. 19. The reſt of the Tribes ſought alſo to enlarge and eſtabliſh their owne Territories: in which warre they laboured with variable ſucceſſe: for as the houſe of Ioſeph recouered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, ſo did the Amorites recouer from Dan all the plaine Countries, and forſt them to ſaue themſelues in the Mountaines. Iud. 1. 25. And now the Iſraelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often hee had miraculouſly a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Elders beeing alſo conſumed, who better aduiſed them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely ioyne themſelues in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more deteſtable) they ſerued the Idols of Baal, and Aſteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had prouoked with their Idolatrie, deliuer them into the hands of the Aramites of Meſopotamia: whom Chuſhan Riſhathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the ſmart of Gods diſpleaſure againſt them eight yeeres, it pleaſed him to haue compaſſion on his people, and to raiſe vp Othoniel to be their Iudge and Leader: who by God aſſiſted, deliuered his brethren from oppreſſion: and inforced the Aramites to returne into their owne Deſarts, and into Meſopotamia adioyning; after which the Iſraelites had peace fourtie yeeres, during all the time of Othoniels gouernment. This Othoniel is thought by Torniatus to haue beene the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Iudges hee is twice called Othoniel the Sonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others doe rather interpret thoſe words (Calebs younger brother) as if they ſignified the meaneſt of his kinred. Indeed it is not likely, that Calebs Daughter ſhould marrie with her owne Vncle; yet it followes not therefore that Othoniel ſhould haue beene the meaneſt of the kinred. Wherefore wee may better thinke that hee was the Nephew of Caleb, (as ſome learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture ſeeme to enforce. For Caleb was the ſonne of Iephunneth, and Othoniel the ſonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his yonger brothers ſonne; to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Couſin German Calebs daughter. Iud. 1. 12. 2608. 2648.

How long it was from the death of Ioſuah to the gouernment of Othoniel, it cannot be found; but it ſeemes to haue beene no ſhort time. For many Warres were made in that ſpace againſt the people of the Land. Laiſh was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the beſt Writers are of opinion, that betweene the times of Ioſua and Othoniel that ciuill Warre brake out betweene the Beniamites and the reſt of Iſrael, for the forcing to death of the Leuites Wife. For it is written, that in thoſe dayes there was no King in Iſrael, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Iuda ledde the people againſt the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, ſo was hee commanded to doe againſt Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whoſe direction they craued, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what ſhould be done, which ſheweth it to haue beene when Ioſua was dead, & before the gouernment of Othoniel, eſpecially conſidering, that all Iud. 17. & 18. & 19.

other times wherein they wanted Gouernors, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attempted such a ciuill Warre, if their power had beene as great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of bloud, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

THere liued in this Age of Othoniel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fift King of Athens: who began to rule in the twentieth yeere of Othoniel, and gouerned fortie yeeres. Hee was Father to Erictheus: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater: vnder whom Linus the Musician liued. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharsus, were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of iron: but Genesis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunninglie both in iron & brasse. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus gouerned Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Græcians and other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Viues vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee that desires his pedigree may finde it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him natiue of Attica: and the sonne of Eleusius King of Eleusina: which Eleusius by carefull industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prowe a grauen or carued Serpent; who because hee made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Gen. 4.22. Whence came the name of Vulcan by Apharesis of the two first letters.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, l. 18. c. 13.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othoniel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Iuda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselues so conuersant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeere when they began to rule) haue hit the marke of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatlie doubt. First, because the Authors themselues, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne works, but coniecture: Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne, but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not onely in the reignes of Heathen Kings & Princes, but euen in the computation of those times which the indisputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seuentie Weekes, and in what not? Whersoeuer the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, & contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue sought by so many wayes to vncouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeere, I auow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a priuate opinion: which I submit to better iudgements. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad vnguem quærenda; In ancient things wee are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that liued about those times.

AFter the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God incouraged Moab to inuade and suppresse them: to performe which he ioyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readilie findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feele the difference betweene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perils: within which they were so speedilie folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteene yeeres vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, hee turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weake man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolued to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, hee assured himselfe of the following victory: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining priuate accesse vpon the pretence of some secret to be reuealed, he pierst his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, he did repasse Iordan, and inuading the Territory of Moab, ouerthrew their Armie consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Samgar his Successour had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourescore yeeres from the death of Othoniel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, trauailed into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth is to bee referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourescore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephisus, which elsewhere hee calleth Chemer, if hee meane not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made known to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus ioyned themselues, they agreed together to recouer her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him: and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering Theseus out of Hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath writtent his storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, saith hee, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for foode to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Euristhеus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S.) were a people of Epirus inhabiting neere the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaines Paus. in Att.

Oeta is one of the moſt famous, where Hercules burnt himſelfe. The Riuer of Acheron (which the Poets deſcribe to bee in Hell) riſeth out of the ſame Hills. There is another Nation of the Moloſſi in Theſſali: but theſe are neighbours to the Caſsiopæi, ſaith Plutarch in his Greeke queſtions.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erichtheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets aſcribe this rape to the North-winde, becauſe Thrace is ſituate North from Athens. In his time alſo Tereus rauiſhed Philomela, of which the fable was deuiſed of her conuerſion into a Nightingale. For Tereus hauing married her ſiſter Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to ſee her ſiſter, forced her in her paſſage, and withall cut out her tongue, that ſhee might not complaine; perſwading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercileſſe behauiour towards her, Philomela expreſſed by her needle vpon cloth, and ſent it to Progne. In reuenge whereof Progne cauſed her onely ſonne Itys to bee cut in pieces, and ſet before Tereus her husband, ſo dreſt as it appeared to be ſome other ordinary foode: of which when hee had eaten his fill, ſhee cauſed his head, hands, and feete, to bee preſented vnto him: and then fled away with ſuch ſpeed towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets fained, that ſhee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pauſanias hath built neere the Rockes Mergi, in the Territorie of Athens. By which, as alſo by the name Daulis, where theſe things are ſuppoſed to haue beene done (whence alſo Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appeares that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digreſſion in his Peloponneſian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryſſa, (as the Poets call him Odryſius) but that Phocis a Countrie in Greece not farre from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his ſonne in law: as it is good to beleeue, ſaith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might haue ſuccour, rather than with any Tereus, that ſhould haue held the Kingdome of Odryſa, which was greatly diſtant from thence. The occaſion that the Poets choſe a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may ſeeme to haue beene partly becauſe, as Pauſanias ſayes; Daulide nec nidificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; As if a Swallow, remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and her ſiſter, did for euer after hate that place.

Of the ſame date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Euſebius makes King of Phrygia: and alſo of that part of which the people were anciently Mæones. Of Tantalus was deuiſed the fable that ſome Poets haue applied to the paſſion of loue: and ſome to the couetous that dare not inioy his riches. Euſebius cals this Tantalus the ſonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Zezes, giue him another Mother. He was ſaid to be the ſon of Iupiter: as ſome will haue it; becauſe he had that Planet in his aſcendent, betokening wiſedome and riches. It is ſaid that when he made a feaſt to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he cauſed his owne Sonne to be ſlaine and dreſt to the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the ſhoulders: whereby was ſignified that thoſe men which ſeek after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all elſe the moſt deareſt. And where it was deuiſed, that hee had alwaies Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet ſuffered the torment of hunger and thirſt, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reaſon of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwiſe and to higher deſires tranſported, he enioyed no pleaſure at all by the reſt. Of whom Ouid:

Euſeb. præp. Euan. l. 2. Zezer hiſt. 20. Chil. 5.

Quæris

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.
Here Tantalus in water seekes for water, and doth misse
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discouered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisedome and vertue to mortall men: which storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expresst in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise and say, That Tantalus, though hee excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against couetousnesse:

Tantalus à labijs sitiens fugientia captat
Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laugheſt thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quòd furatus,
Cœtaneis conuiuis
Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue
To guests of his owne age, to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Diuinitie ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleanest meates in a foule stomacke, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reserued mysteries are often peruerted by an vncleane and defiled minde.

To you it is giuen (saith Christ in Marke) to know the mysterie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things be done in parables. So is it said of him that hee expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene inferre vpon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset effari ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem cælum tertium & vsq; ad illud progessio suppeditauit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius constaret; If Paul might haue vttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third heauens, and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture we might know somewhat more of God. Marke 4.11. Marke 4.34. Greg. in Orat. de recta ratione disp. de Deo. 2 Cor. 12.

Pythagoras, saith Reuclin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, quæ ita reciperet, vt Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & vnguenta Scarabæus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius, quàm loquendo apprehendantur; To set an Asse to a harpe, or to learne mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a trumpet, or a Iay a viall, or Scarabies and vncleane flies soueraigne ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Ægyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their couered meanings.

But to proceede with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus liued whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloued of Iupiter, to auoid Iuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was deliuered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanius speaking of the graue of this Gyant, affirmes that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer:

Hom. Od. 11.

Porrectuſque nouem Tityus per iugera terrâ,
Aſsiduas atro viſcere paſcit aues.

Nine furlongs ſtretcht lies Tityus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry birds with his renewing liuer daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was ſtill eaten in Hell by birds, and yet ſtill liued, and had his fleſh renewed.

Admetus King of Theſſalie liued alſo in this Age, whom it is ſaid that Apollo firſt ſerued as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him aduanced; but hauing ſlaine Hyacinthus, he croſt the Helleſpont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the wals of Troy, not by making the bricks leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which ſaith:

Ilion aſpicies, firmataque turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ ſtructa canore lyræ.

Strong Ilion thou ſhall ſee with wals and towers high,
Built with the harpe of wiſe Apollo's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke. And that he alſo laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megariens witneſſe, ſaith Pauſanius.

Pauſan Att.

In theſe daies alſo of Ehud, or (as ſome finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, liued Perſeus, the ſonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whoſe Souldiers (as they ſailed out of Peloponneſus, to ſeeke their aduenture on Africa ſide) Meduſa, the Daughter and Succeſſor of Phorcus, being weakely accompanied as ſhe hunted, neere the Lake Triton, was ſurpriſed and ſlaine: whoſe beauty, when Peſeus beheld, he cauſed her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was ſuch and ſo much admired, and the beholders ſo aſtoniſhed which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Meduſa's head, were turned into ſtones.

Triton a Lake of Africa, which Plinie calleth Pallantias. Didym. in pereg Hiſt.

Cecrops, the ſecond of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acriſius the 13. or after Euſebius, the 14. King of the Argiues, began alſo their reignes, as it is ſaid, in the time of this Iudge: of which the firſt ruled 40. yeares, and the ſecond 31. yeares. Alſo Bellerophon liued in this age, being the ſonne of Glaucus, the ſonne of Siſyphus: who inticed by Antea or Sthenobia, the wife of Prætus of the Argiues, to accompanie her, but refuſing it, ſhe accuſed him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus ſent Bellerophon into Lycia, about ſome affaires of weight, betweene him and his ſonne in law Iobates: giuing ſecret order to Iobates to diſpatch him: but Iobates thinking it diſhonourable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him againſt Chimæra, a Monſter, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pittying his innocency, ſent him the winged Horſe Pegaſus, ſprung vp of the bloud of Meduſa, formerly ſlaine by the ſouldiers of Perſeus in Africa, to tranſport him, a horſe that none other could maſter or bridle but Minerua: vpon which beaſt Bellerophon ouer-came Chimæra: and performed the other ſeruices giuen him in charge: which done, as hee returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambuſh to haue ſlaine him: but being victorious alſo ouer all thoſe, he arriued to Iobates in ſafetie: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, firſt with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which hee grew ſo inſolent, as hee attempted to flye vp to heauen vpon his Pegaſus: whoſe pride Iupiter diſdaining, cauſed one of his ſtinging flyes ſo to vexe Pegaſus, as he caſt off Bellerophon from his backe, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegaſus being diſcharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heauen: and being fed in Iupiters owne ſtable, Aurora beg'd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuerſly expounded, as firſt by ſome, That it pleaſeth God to relieue men in their innocent and vndeſerued aduerſitie, and to caſt downe thoſe which are too high minded: according to that which is ſaid of Bellerophon: that when he was expoſed to extreame hazard, or rather certaine death, hee found both deliuerance and honour; but waxing ouer-proud and preſumptuous in his glorious fortunes, hee was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of ſorrow, and euer-during miſerie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whoſe ſhip had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ſhip, and a Dragon in the ſtearne, of which three beaſts this Monſter Chimæra was ſaid to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purſued with a kinde of Galley, of ſuch ſwiftneſſe, that it was called the flying Horſe: to whom the inuention of ſailes (the wings of a ſhip) are alſo attributed. Many other expoſitions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ſhip, for ſo Virgil calleth one of the greateſt ſhips of Æneas. Plutar. in clarie mulier. L. 5. Æneid.

Ion alſo, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Iauan) deriue their name of Iones, is ſaid to haue beene about Ehuds time: Homer cals them Iaones, which hath a neere reſemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps it might be ſo that Ion himſelfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a cuſtome obſeruable in the Hiſtories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in ſome the principall of his iſſue. Homer in hym. ad Apoll. Lib. 18. c. 12. de ciuit. Dei, & 28 c. 15.

The inuaſion of India by Liber Pater, is by ſome reported as done in this age: but S. Auguſtine makes him farre more ancient: placing him betweene the comming out of Ægypt, and the death of Ioſua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, aſcribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops, flouriſhed: who gaue name to Peloponneſus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. IIII.

Of Debora and her Contemporaries.

AFter Iſrael had liued in peace and plenty to the end of theſe 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodneſſe, and many of thoſe being worne out, which were witneſſes of the former miſerie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar; the reſt began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle ſecuritie; ſo is ſecuritie as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and ſubuerſion: of which all eſtates in the world haue taſted by interchange of times. Therefore when their ſinnes were againe ripe for puniſhment, Iabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, inuaded the Territorie of Iſrael; and hauing in his ſeruice 900. yron Chariots, beſides the reſt of his forces, he held them in ſubiection twentie yeares, till it pleaſed God to raiſe vp Deborah, the Propheteſſe, who incouraged Barac to leuie a force out of Nepthalim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nepthalim were more forward than the reſt in this action, it may ſeeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the ſame Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grieuance, which in them was more ſenſible, than in others, becauſe Hazor and Haroſeth the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nepthalim. So in the dayes of Ieptha the Gileadites tooke the greateſt care, becauſe the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, preſſed moſt vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleaſed God by the left hand of Ehud to deliuer Iſrael from the Moabites: and by the counſaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Siſera by Iael the Kenites wife: ſo was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakeſt meanes. For the mighty Aſſyrian Nabuchodonoſor, who was a King of Kings, and reſiſtleſſe, he ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the cauſers of his brutiſh melancholy: and changed his matchleſſe pride into the baſe humility of a Beaſt. And to approue that he is the Lord of all power, he ſometime puniſheth by inuiſible ſtrength, as when he ſlaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as hee did the Ægyptians in Moſes time: ſometime by dead bodies; as when he drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea: and the Canaanites by haile-ſtones in the time of Ioſua: ſometimes by the miniſterie of men, as when he ouerthrew the foure Kings of the Eaſt, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the houſhold ſeruants of Abraham. He cauſed the Moabites and Ammonites to ſet vpon their owne confederate the Armie of the Edomites; and hauing ſlaine them to kill one another in the ſight of Iehoſaphat: and of the like to theſe a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Propheteſſe ſpeake vnto Barac in theſe words: But this iourney that thou takeſt, ſhall not be for thine honour, for 2. Chron. 20. Iud. 4. 9.

the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Iabin fell to the ground, euen to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Iabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Iudges.

After all which Deborah giueth thankes to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfulnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weake estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these
Iud. 5. v. 8. words: Was there a shield or speare seene among fortie thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were seuered and amased, some of them confined ouer Iordan, and Verse 17. durst not ioyne themselues to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Asherites kept the Sea-coast, and forsooke their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesseth Iael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondencie with Iabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them meanes, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praise and thankes to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Iabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos which had continued 544. yeares, was translated to Mycæna: The translation of this Kingdome Viues out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lynceus diuided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos it selfe: Pratus his brother possest Ephyra or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities with all the Territorie to-
Pau. in Corinthiacis. wards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tirynthos, which witnesse Pratus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is fained that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with childe: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other Worthy man, corrupted her keepers with gold: and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when hee grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vnwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Pratus: and built Mycæna. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brasen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this witie obseruation:

Inclusam Danaen, turris ahenea,
Robustæq; fores, & vigilum canum
Tristes excubiæ, munierant satis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:
Si non Acrisium Virginis abditæ
Custodem pauidum, Iupiter & Venus
Risissent, fore enim tutum iter & patens,
Conuerso in pretium Deo.
Aureus per medios ire satellites,
Et perrumpere amat saxa, potentius
Ictu fulmineo.

The

The brasen Tower with dores close bar'd,
And watchfull bandogs frightfull guard,
Kept safe the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret loue:
Till smiling Venus, and wise Ioue
Beguild her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden showre,
The god into her lap did powre
Himselfe, and tooke his pleasure.
Through gardes, and stonie wals to breake,
The thunder-bolt is farre more weake,
Then is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reigne in the first yeare of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time to the end of Sthenelus, Castor misreckoneth 400. yeares. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but at 417. Io was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Ægyptians called Isis.

Phoroneus,
Apis,
Argus,
Pirasus, Phorbas,
Triopas,
Crotopus,
Sthenelus,
Danaus,
Lynceus,
Abas, Acrisius,
Pelops.

After the translation to Mycena, Mar. Scotus findes these Kings:

Perseus,
Sthenelus,
Eurystheus,

Atreus and Thyestes } The sonnes of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atreus by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Agamemnon,
Ægysthus,
Orestes,
Tisamenus,
Penthilus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leaue out the two first, and the last: beginning with Eurystheus: and ending with Penthilus. In Tisamenus time the Heraclida returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas who reigned in Phrygia: and Ilus who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronologicall table, as contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that liued in this Age.

Debora and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Iudge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enioyed any quiet or prosperity: the Iudge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatrie. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did did ſo maſter them in a ſhort time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to ſaue themſelues, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places

Iud.6. of hardeſt acceſſe: their enemies poſſeſſing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in harueſt time by themſelues, and the multitude of their cattle, deſtroying all that grew vp: couering the fields as thicke as graſſe-hoppers: which ſeruitude laſted ſeauen yeares.

Iud.6.v.5. Then the Lord by his Angell ſtirred vp Gideon the ſonne of Ioaſh, afterward called Ierubbaal: whoſe feare and vnwillingneſſe, and how it pleaſed God to hearten him in Iud.c.6.&7. his enterpize, it is both largely and preciſely ſet downe in the holy Scriptures: as alſo how it pleaſed God by a few ſelect perſons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hoſts; Each of theſe 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher; inſtruments of more terrour than force, with which hee gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarum: who hearing ſo loud a noiſe, and ſeeing (at the cracke of ſo many pitchers broken) ſo many lights about them, eſteeming the Armie of Iſrael to be infinite, and ſtrucken with a ſodaine feare, they all fled without a ſtroke ſtricken: and were ſlaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made priſoners and ſlaine. In his returne the Ephraimites began to quarrell with Gideon, becauſe he made warre without their aſſiſtance, being then greedy of glory, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterpriſe) would no doubt haue held themſelues happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeaſing them with a milde anſwere, followed after the enemie, in which purſuite being tyred with trauaile, and weary euen with the ſlaughtering of his enemies, he deſired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreſhed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had ſaued themſelues by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations, which had inuaded and waſted Iſrael: to wit, Oreb and Zeeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, ſought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like ſort refuſed to ſuccour him. To both of theſe places he threatned therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the proſequution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would teare the fleſh of thoſe of Succoth with Thornes and Briars, and deſtroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of theſe two Cities ſhould refuſe reliefe to their brethren the Iſraelites, eſpecially after ſo great a victorie: if I may preſume to make coniecture, it ſeemes likely, firſt that thoſe Cities ſet ouer Iordan, & in the way of all inuaſions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Iſrael, had either made their own peace with thoſe Nations, & were not ſpoiled by them: or elſe they knowing that Zeba and Salmunna were eſcaped with a great part of their army, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and diſpoſitions of theſe men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, eſpecially of thoſe which follow the warre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praiſe-worthy actions, for the honour and ſafety of their owne Countrey, though themſelues may be aſſured to beare a part of the ſmart of contrary ſucceſſe. And ſuch malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Countrey ſhould ſuffer hazzard and want, than that ſuch men as they miſlike, ſhould be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Baſan, as it is thought. Iud.8.10. Now Gideon, how or whereſoeuer it were that he refreſhed himſelfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and purſued his former victory to the vttermoſt: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (ſuſpecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe ſurpriſed them, and ſlaughtered thoſe 15000. remaining: hauing put to the ſword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he tooke Zebah and Salmunna priſoners: whom becauſe themſelues had exequuted Gideons brethren before at Tabor, he cauſed them both to be ſlaine: or (as it is written) at their owne requeſt ſlew them with his owne hands: his Sonne whom he firſt commanded to doe it, refuſing it; and in his returne from the conſummation of this merueilous victory, he tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiuing no offence committed againſt him: either by ſtrangers or by his brethren the Iſraelites. But ſuch mercy as he ſhewed to others, his owne children found ſoone after his death, according to that which hath beene ſaid before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are neuer left vnſatisfied: for as he ſlew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnuſuall torments, ſo were his owne 70. ſonnes all, but one, murthered by his owne baſtard Abimelec. The like Analogie is obſerued by the Rabbines, in the greateſt of the plagues which God brought vpon the Ægyptians, who hauing cauſed the male children of the Hebrewes to be ſlaine, others of them to be caſt into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like meaſure, deſtroying their own firſt borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his armie in the red ſea. And hereof a world of examples might be giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Hiſtories.

In the end ſo much did the people reuerence Gideon in the preſent for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraigntie ouer them, and to eſtabliſh him in the Gouernment; which he refuſed, anſwering; I will not reigne ouer you, neither ſhall my childe reigne ouer you, but the Lord ſhall, &c. But he deſired the people that they would beſtow on him the golden eare-rings, which euery man had gotten. For the Iſmaelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, vſed to weare them: the waight of all which was a thouſand and ſeuen hundred Shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. l. if we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. And becauſe he conuerted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew ſilke, purple, ſcarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the High Prieſt onely, and ſet vp the ſame in his owne Citie of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Iſrael to Idolatrie, the ſame was the deſtruction of Gideon and his houſe. Iud. 8. 23. Exod. 28. Iudg. 8. 28.

There was another kinde of Ephod beſides this of the High Prieſts, which the Leuites vſed, and ſo did Dauid when he danced before the Arke: and Samuel, while he was yet yong, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was poſſible for Gideon with 300. men to deſtroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained; we may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the firſt alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and diſorder: yet all the reſt of the armie came into the ſlaughter, and purſuite, for it is written; That he men of Iſrael being gathered together out of Nepthalie, and out of Aſher, and out of Manaſſe, purſued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyſe of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution. Iud. c. 7. v. 23.

There liued with Gideon, Ægeus, the ſonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euriſtheus King of Mycenæ: Atreus and Thyeſtes the ſonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponneſus, and after the death of Euriſtheus, the Kingdome of Mycenæ fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in iealouſie, as an attempter, both of his wife and Crowne, ſlew the children of Thyeſtes, and cauſing their fleſh to be dreſt, did therewith feaſt their father. But this cruelty was not vnreuenged. For both Atreus and his ſonne Agamemnon were ſlaine by a baſe ſonne of Thyeſtes, yea the grand-children, and all the linage of Atreus died by the ſame ſword.

In Gideons time alſo thoſe things were ſuppoſed to haue beene done, which are written of Dædalus and Icarus. Dædalus, they ſay, hauing ſlaine his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for ſuccour; where for his excellent workemanſhip he was greatly eſteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Ægypt. Afterward he was ſaid to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Paſiphae the Queene, that ſhe, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her ſelfe into the Cowe, ſatisfie her luſt, a thing no leſſe vnnaturall than incredible, had not that ſhameleſſe Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beaſtly ſpectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpoſe, as may ſeeme, to verifie the old fable. For ſo it appeares by thoſe verſes of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable ſhew, as a goodly Pageant, in thoſe vicious times.

Iunctam Paſiphaen Dicteo credite Tauro
Vidimus, accepit fabula priſca fidem.
Nec ſe miratur Cæſar, longæua vetuſtas
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Paſiphae, Seruius makes a leſſe vnhoneſt conſtruction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counſaile, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which ſignifieth a Bull, who begat her with childe; and that ſhe being deliuered of two ſonnes, the one reſembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that ſhe was deliuered of the Monſter Minotaur, halfe Man and halfe a Bull. But this practiſe being diſcouered, and Dædalus appointed to be ſlaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicil: in which paſſage he made ſuch expedition, as it was fained that he faſhioned wings for himſelfe and his ſonne to tranſport them. For whereas Minos purſued him with boats which had oares onely, Dædalus framed ſailes both for his owne boate, and for his ſonnes, by which he outwent thoſe that had him in chaſe. Vpon which new inuention, Icarus bearing himſelfe ouerbold, was ouerborne and drowned.

It is alſo written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could moue themſelues, and goe, becauſe he carued them with legs, armes and hands; whereas thoſe that preceded him, could onely preſent the body and head of thoſe men, whom they cared to counterfait, and yet the workmanſhip was eſteemed very rare. But Plutarke, who had ſeene ſome of thoſe that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

Herinod. Plat. Paus. lib. 9. With Gideon alſo flouriſhed Linus the Theban, the ſonne of Apollo, and Terpſichore, who inſtructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones courſe, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was ſlaine by Hercules his ſcholler with his owne harpe.

Strab. l. 9. Againe, in this age thoſe things ſpoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue beene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by ſea and land, was by the Corinthians Armie, led by Oedipus, ouercome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to thoſe whom ſhe maſtered, was meant by the rockie and vnacceſſible mountaine neere Thebes, which ſhe defended; and by Oedipus diſſoluing her probleme, his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, becauſe exceeding ſwift, and with the body of a Lyon for her cruelty. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time diſproue it, for he cals her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her helpe he had caſt Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the ſiſter of Draco, which Sphinx taking in deſpightfull part, with her owne troope ſhe held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence ſhe continued a ſharpe warre vpon the Thebans, till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thruſt his brother out of Crete, and held ſharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, becauſe his ſonne Androgeus was ſlaine by them. He poſſeſt himſelfe of Megara, by the treaſon of Scylla, daughter of Niſus the King. He was long Maſter of the ſea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere ſeuen of their ſonnes: which tribute Theſeus releaſed, as ſhall be ſhewed, when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thola. In the end he was ſlaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, Ariſt. pol. l. 1. while he purſued Dædalus: and was eſteemed by ſome to be the firſt law-giuer to thoſe Ilands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the Gyant, who was ſaid to haue 60. and odde cubites of length, which though Plutarke doth confirme, reporting that there was ſuch a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules ſlew Antæus: yet for my ſelfe I thinke it but a lowd lye. That Antæus was of great ſtrength, and a cunning wreſtler, Euſebius affirmeth: and becauſe he caſt ſo many men to the ground, he was fained to be the ſonne of the Earth. Plinie ſaith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Heſperides in Mauritania. S. Auguſtine affirmes that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra alſo which he ouercame, Plato expoundeth to be a ſubtle Sophiſter.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

ABout the eleuenth yeere of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonautes: of which many fabulous diſcourſes haue beene written, the ſumme of which is this.

Pelias the ſonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers ſide to Æſon, who was Iaſons father, reigning in Iolcus a town of Theſſalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, inuited Iason to him, who comming hastily, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing hee were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heede: to which question when Iason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos, to fetch the golden fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, hauing a ship built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the counsell of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhis the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus, sonnes of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great Soothsayers, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde boare: Asterius and Palmenus or Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Laërtes the father of Vlysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lynceus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselues: Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prowe was a table of the beech of Dodona, which could speake. They arriued first at Lemnos, the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to leade an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night they were driuen by contrary windes backe into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Hauen, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which meanes they fell to blowes, insomuch that the Argonautes slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceiued, with many teares they solemnized his funerall. Then departed they againe and arriued shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elates, who went to seeke Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Mysia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Mysia the Argonautes sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient inhabitants of the Countrey, ouer whom Amycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whorlebats, in which kinde of fight he had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryces in reuenge of his death slew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmydessus, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long clawes, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: you shall doe well (quoth he) first of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be couered, and meat set on, which was no sooner set downe, then that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed pranckes: when Zetes and Calais the winged yong men saw this, they drew their swords, & pursued them through the ayre; some say that both the Harpies and the yong men died of wearinesse in the fight, & pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did couenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withall of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to aduenture after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselues in vain. They did so, & perceiuing that the pigeon had onely lost a piece of her taile, they obserued the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of the poope was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue stood still: for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the riuer Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Soothsayer of their company was slaine by a wilde boare; also here Typhis died: and Ancæus vndertooke to steare the ship. So they passed by the riuer Thermodon, and mount Caucasus, and came to the riuer Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchos. When they were entred the hauen, Iason went to Æetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commandement of Pelias, and cause of his comming, desiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe, if hee alone would yoake together two brazen hooft buls, and plowing the ground with them, sowe dragons teeth, which Minerua had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These buls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had giuen them to Æetes.

Whilest Iason was in a great perplexity about this taske, Medæa the daughter of Æetes, fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre foorth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priuilie to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gaue she to him a medicine wherewith she bad him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preserue him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedy which inconuenience, she bad him throw stones amongst them as soone as they came vp thicke, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that hee might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile; whereto when the euent had answered, he againe demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was so farre from approuing such his desire, that he deuised how to destroy the Argonautes, and burne their ship; which Medæa perceiuing, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oake in the groue of Mars, where they say it was, kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medæa, cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, she went with Iason into the ship Argo; hauing with her, her brother Absyrtus.

Æetes vnderstanding the practises of Medæa, prouided to pursue the ship, whom when Medæa perceiued to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in diuers places, of which Æetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi, the Greeke word signifieth Diuision. Afterwards he sent many of his subiects to seeke the ship Argo, threatning that if they brought not backe Medæa, they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Iupiter, offended with the slaughter of Absyrtus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Absyrtides, there the ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them, and said, that the anger of Iupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were clensed by Circe, from the murther of Absyrtus. Now they thereupon sayling betweene the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the sea of Sardinia and along the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who clensed them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. Onely Butes swamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauished, and carried to Lylibæum in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing past the Syrens, they came betweene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoake. But Thetis and the Nereides, conueyed them safe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coasted Sicilie where the beeues of the Sunne were, and touched at Corcyra, the Iland of the Phaaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Meane while, the men of Colchos, that had beene sent by Æetes in quest of the ship of Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themselues to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountaines of Corcyra, others in the Ilands Absyrtides; and some comming to the Phæaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medæa of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answere, that if she were not Iasons wife, they should haue her; but if she were alreadie married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos not daring to returne home, stayed with the Phæaces; so the Argonautes departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland, Minos reigned, who had a man of brasse giuen to him (as some of the Fablers say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his body reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was closed vp with a brazen naile, his name was Talus: his custome was to runne thrice a day about the Iland for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medæa with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortall, she drew out the naile that stopt his veine, by which meanes all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slaine by Paan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes sailed to Ægina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Ægina they sailed by Eubœa and Locris home to Iolcos, where they arriued, hauing spent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Some there are that by this iourney of Iason vnderstand the mysterie of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the twelue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinkes that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden booke of Parchment, which is of sheepe-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others would signifie by Iason, wisedome, and moderation, which ouer-commeth all perils: but that which is most probable is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeede to rob Colchos, to which they might arriue by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepe falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world; and the people there inhabiting vse to set many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and Currents in the passage betweene Greece and the bottome of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those fiery buls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasse, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and aduentures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poeticall morals: all which Homer afterward vsed (the man of brasse excepted) in the description of Vlysses his trauailes, on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Iair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hyppolytus, &c.

After the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembring what offers had beene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraignty, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was natiue) to make election of himselfe; who being easily moued with the glory, to haue a King of their owne, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of siluer of their idoll Baalberith, with Iudg. 9. 4. which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabounds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wiues, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Iotham the Verse 5. yongest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which he executed on one stone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath beene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euerlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preseruation of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane so euer) which may serue it: remembring nothing, whatsoeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alleadge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the errour or weakenesse of the vndertakers, and rather praiseth the aduenture than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient then man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Diuell which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting euery age, and mans condition.

Iotham, the yongest of Gideons sonnes, hauing escaped the present perill, fought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this mercilesse tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had no power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be gouerned. This hee taught them by the Oliue, which contented it selfe with its fatnesse, the Figge tree with sweetenesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraignty. He also foretold them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men backe whom rage without right led on) Gaal the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman, and finding himselfe mortally bruised, he commanded his owne page to pierce his body, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech vsurped the Gouernment, the Lapithæ and Centaures made war against the Thebanes. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that deuised to mannage horses, to bridle and to sit them: in somuch as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plaines, those which had neuer seene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first inuaded that Empire.

Palaphatus, l. 1 de incredib.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Issachar gouerned Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Iair the Gileadite 22. yeeres, who seemes to be descended of Iair the sonne of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Hauoth Iair. For to this Iair there remained thirtie of those Cities, which his ancester had recouered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

Deut. 3 14. Num. 32. 41. Iudg. 10.

2901. When Iair iudged Israel, Priamus began to reigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransome, he rebuilt and greatly strenghened, and adorned Troy; and so farre inlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreame Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fiftie sonnes, whereof seauenteene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helena the wife of Menelaus, the cause of the warre which followed.

In Tusc.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens began likewise to reigne in the beginning of Iair: some writers call him the sonne of Neptune and Æthra: but Plutark in the Storie of his life finds him begotten by Ægeus, of whom the Græcian sea betweene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forst them to pay him him seuen of their sonnes euery yeere for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queene, had the charge of them: among these seuen Theseus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free his Countrie of that slauerie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing possest himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he receiued from her a bottome of thred, by which he conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Ægypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, he found a ready way to returne. But whereas his father Ægeus had giuen order, that if he came backe with victorie and in safetie, he should vse a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournefull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens. This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ægeus descrying the Shippe of Theseus with a blacke sayle, did cast himselfe ouer the rockes downe into the Sea, afterward called of his name Ægeum.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage betweene Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom hee mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who vsed by that Art to kill others. Hee also ridde the Country of Procrustes, who vsed to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastened by cordes such as hee tooke, part of them to one and part to the other bough, and by the springing vp tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischieuous theeues and murtherers. Hee ouerthrew the armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territorie of Athens. Theseus hauing taken their Queene Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phædra, falling in loue, and hee refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phædra perswaded Theseus that his sonne offred to force her: after which it is fained, that Theseus besought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage, sent out his Sea-Calues, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vndeserued destinie, when Phædra had heard of, she strangled her selfe. After which it is fained, that Diana entreated Æsculapius to set Hippolytus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italie, to accompanie her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his Father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receiue many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Æsculapius, to wit, some skilfull Physician, or Chirurgion healed againe; after which he passed into Italy, where he liued with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of those auncient prophane Stories, Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vaste places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange beasts, birdes, and fishes, and with Mathematicall lines; so doe the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from beeing dispersed in thinne and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for deuising them lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lottes, or names written on shelles, which was a deuice of his owne.

Hee stole Helen (as they say) when she was fiftie yeers old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux ouertumed, when they followed after Theseus to recouer their sister. Eratistratus and Pausanias write that Theseus begot her with childe at Argos, where she erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that tale vnlikely to bee true, and so doth Ouid, Non tamen ex facto fructum tulit ille petitum, &c. The rape Eusebius findes in the first of Iair, who gouerned Israel 22. yeeres, to whom succeeded Iephta or Iepte sixe yeeres, to whom Ibzan who ruled seuen yeeres, and then Habdon eight yeeres: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Theseus had a childe by her in the first of Iair, (at which which time wee must count her no lesse than fifteene yeeres old, for the women did not commonly begin so young as they doe now) she was then at least two and fiftie yeeres old at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stollen by Paris eight and thirtie: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnasseus doe in effect consent, that the Citie was entred, and burnt in the first yere of Demophoon King of Athens, the successor of Menestheus, the successor of Theseus, seuenteene dayes before the Summer Tropique; and that about the eleuenth of September following, the Troians crost the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there; and in the next spring that they nauigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeere, the next summer they arriued at Laurentum, and builded Lauinium. But Saint Augustine hath otherwise, that when Polyphides gouerned Sicyon, Menestheus Athens, Tantanes Assyria, Habdon Israel, then Æneas arriued in Italie, transporting with him in twentie shippes the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and heereof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia Phestus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeeres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successours, Adrastus, who reigned foure yeeres, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iair; so is also Menestheus King of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyria, during the gouernment of these two peaceable Iudges, Mitreus and after him Tantanes reigned. In Ægypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramses, and afterwards Annemenes.

§. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greeke Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truelie against the Peripatetickes) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiection.

——— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerum, & mundi, semperque aeterna fuêre,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troiæ,
Non alias alij quoque res cecinere poetæ?

If all this world had no originall,
But things haue euer beene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corne than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armor of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeues, and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vsuall exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenæ the principall Citie in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easily appeare to such as consider, what Thucidydes the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the præface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these latter times, idle Chroniclers vse when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to reade, so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that sauoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the briefe whereof is this.

OEdipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing beene cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Iocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in processe of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the grieuous murther and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her selfe. Some say that OEdipus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howsoeuer it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should reigne one yeere, and the other another yeere, and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeeres gouernment resigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeere, hee refused to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fledde vnto Argos, where Adrastus the sonne of Talaus then reigned, vnto whose palace comming by night, he was driuen to seeke lodging in an out-house, on the backeside. Hom. Odyss. 11.

There he met with Tydeus the sonne of OEneus, who was fledde from Calydon: with whom striuing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noyse, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiuing in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembred an olde Oracle, by which he was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deipyle vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as he could draw to follow him, he was desirous among others to carrie Amphiaraus the sonne of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is saide to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adrastus, did both vtterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaraus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbad his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a iewell, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betweene Amphiaraus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eryphile, either of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did loue a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to foresee than auoide destinie, sought for such comfort as reuenge might afford him, giuing in charge vnto his sonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre vpon the Thebanes.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces of which the seuen chiefe leaders were; himselfe, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (instead of whom some name Mecisteus) all Argiues, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Aetolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Armie came to the Nemean Wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water; shee hauing a childe in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argiues to a spring: but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Hypsipyle the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saued when the women of the Ile slew all the males by conſpiracie, intending to leade an Amazonian life. For ſuch her pietie, the Lemnian wiues did ſell her to Pyrates, and the Pyrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemaa, whoſe young ſonne Opheltes or Archemorus, ſhe did nurſe, and loſt, as is ſhewed before. When vpon the childes death ſhee hid her ſelfe for feare of her maſter, Amphiaraus told her ſonnes where they ſhould finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had ſlaine the childe, and in memorie of the chance, did inſtitute ſolemne funerall games called Nemean, wherein Adraſtus wanne the prize with his ſwift horſe Arion, Tydeus with whorlebats, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wreſtling, Parthenopeus at ſhooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the firſt inſtitution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus, a Lacedemonian. Some ſay by Hercules, when he had ſlaine the Nemaan Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is heere ſet downe.

From Nemaa the Argiues marching onwards, arriued at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them ſent Embaſſadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Couenants betweene him and Polynices. This meſſage was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly reſolued to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiuing, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enuy and malice of the people, who laid fiftie men in ambuſh to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fiftie he ſlew all but one, whom he ſent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witneſſe of his valour. When the Argiues vnderſtood how reſolued Eteocles was, they preſented themſelues before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is ſaid to haue had at that time ſeuen gates, which belike ſtood not far aſunder, ſeeing that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very farre ſtronger, could ſcarce muſter vp more thouſands then Thebes had gates) did compaſſe the towne. Adraſtus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiaraus at Proëtis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopaus at Electa, and Polynices at Hypſiſta. In the meane ſeaſon, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them, tooke aduiſe of Tireſias the Soothſayer, who promiſed victorie to the Thebans, if Menacius the ſonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vow himſelfe to be ſlaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Dinell, and ſo enuious at his Creatours glory, that hee not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and ſacrifice with all Diuine worſhip, but commandeth vs to offer our ſelues, and our children vnto him, when he hath ſufficiently clowded mens vnderſtanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And ſuch abominable ſacrifice of men, maides, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Galles, Germanes, Cyprians, Ægyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were moſt filled with ſuperſtition. But as they grew more wiſe, ſo did he waxe leſſe impudent in cunning, though not leſſe malicious in deſiring the continuance of ſuch barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without aduiſe of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country reſt contented with an Oxe in ſtead of a man. Tiberius forbad humane ſacrifices in Africk, and crucified the Prieſts in the groues where they had practiſed them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in ſtead of the liuing: yet among the ſaluages in the Weſt Indies theſe cruell offerings haue beene practiſed of late ages: which as it is a ſufficient argument that Satans malice is onely couered and hidden by this ſubtiltie among ciuill people: ſo may it ſerue as a probable Coniecture of the barbariſmes then reigning in Greece. For Menacius, as ſoone as he vnderſtood that his death might purchaſe victorie to his people, beſtowed himſelfe (as he thought) vpon Mars, killing himſelfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was a battaile fought, wherein the Argiues preuailed ſo farre at the firſt, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walls, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was caſt downe, or (as Writers haue it) was ſtricken down by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argiues fled. Many on each part were ſlaine in this battell, which cauſed both ſides to deſire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in ſingle fight: whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the ſonnes of Aſtacus behaued themſelues very valiantly: Iſmarus one of the ſonnes ſlew Hippomedon, which was one of of the ſeuen Princes: Parthenopæus being another of the ſeuen (who was ſaid to haue been ſo faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was ſlaine by Amphidicus, or as ſome ſay, by Periclymenus the ſonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiaraus, which he cruelly tore open, and ſwallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is ſaid, that Pallas, who had brought from Iupiter ſuch remedie for his wounds, as ſhould haue made him immortall, refuſed to beſtow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall, did periſh through the beaſtly rage that he ſhewed at his death.

The hoaſt of the Argiues being wholly diſcomfited, Adraſtus and Amphiaraus fledde: of whom Amphiaraus is ſaid to haue beene ſwallowed quicke into the earth, neere to the riuer Iſmenus, together with his Chariot, and ſo loſt out of mens ſight: being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carkaſſes, or drowned in the riuer: and his body neuer found, nor greatly ſought for. Adraſtus eſcaped on his good horſe Arion, and came to Athens; where ſitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made ſupplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Gouernment of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not ſuffer the bodies of the Argiues to bee buried: but cauſed Antigone, the onely daughter then liuing of OEdipus, to bee buried quicke, becauſe ſhee had ſought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condeſcending to the requeſt of Adraſtus, did ſend foorth an Armie vnder the Conduct of Theſeus, which tooke Thebes, and reſtored the bodies of the Argiues to Sepulture: at which time Euadne the wife of Capaneus, threw her ſelfe into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the ſonnes of thoſe Captaines which were ſlaine at Thebes, that any leſſe reuenge ſhould bee taken of their fathers death, then the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne yeere after hauing leuied forces, Ægialeus the ſonne of Adraſtus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Therſander of Polynices, and Euryalus of Mecißeus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alcmæon the ſonne of Amphiaraus: with whom alſo went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promiſed victory if Alcmæon were their Captaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commanded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were incountred by Laodamas the ſon of Eteocles then King of the Thebanes, (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and ſlue Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worſt, and driuen to flie, or (according to Apollodorus) ſlain by Alcmæon. After this diſaſter the citizens began to deſire compoſition; but in the meane time they conuayed themſelues with their wiues & children away from thence by night, and ſo began to wander vp and downe, til at length they built the Town called Eßiæa. The Argiues, when they perceiued that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entring into it, ſacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waſte; howbeit it is reported by ſome, that the Towne was ſaued by Thirſander, the ſonne of Polynices, who cauſing the Citizens to returne, did there reigne ouer them. That he ſaued the Citie from vtter deſtruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebanes to the Warre of Troy, which very ſhortly after enſued.

§. VIII.

Of Iephta, and how the three hundred yeeres which he ſpeaketh of, Iud. 11. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. 13. 20. 1. Reg. 6. 1. together with ſome other things touching Chronologie about theſe times.

AFter the death of Iair (neere about whoſe times theſe things hapned in Greece, & during whoſe gouernment, & that of Thola, Iſrael liued in peace & in order) they reuolted again from the law & ſeruice of God, and became more wicked & idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worſhipped Baal & Aſteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen nations adioyning, and imbraced the idolls of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites & Ammonites: with thoſe of the Philiſtims. And as before it pleaſed God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: ſo now he ſcourged them by the * Ammonites, and afterward by the Philiſtims. Iud. 10.

* The perſecutiõ of the Ammonites laſted 18. yeeres, and ended in the yeere of the World 2820. in which yeere Iephta began. Iud. 11.

Now among the Iſraelites, thoſe of Gilead being moſt oppreſt, becauſe they bordered vpon vpon the Ammonites, they were inforſt to ſeeke Iephta, whom they had formerly deſpiſed and caſt from them, becauſe he was baſe borne; but he (notwithſtanding thoſe former iniuries) participating more of godly compaſſion, than of diueliſh hatred and reuenge, was content to leade the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they ſhould eſtabliſh him their Gouernour after victory. And when hee had diſputed with Ammon for the Land, diſproued Ammons right, and fortified the title of Iſrael by many arguments, the ſame preuailing nothing, he began the warre; and being ſtrengthened by God, ouerthrew them: and did not onely beate them out of the plaines, but forſt them ouer the Iud.11.33. mountaines of Arabia, euen to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities expreſt heretofore in the deſcription of the holy Land. After which victory it is ſaid, that he performed the vaine vow which he made, to ſacrifice the firſt liuing creature hee incountred, comming out of his houſe to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and onely childe, who with all patience ſubmitted her ſelfe, and onely deſired two moneths time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; becauſe in her the iſſues of her Father ended: but the other opinion that ſhee was not offered, is more probable,

Bor. in Iud. which Borrhæus and others proue ſufficiently.

After theſe things the children of Iſrael, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephta's victorie, or otherwiſe making way to their future calamitie, and to the moſt grieuous ſlauery that euer Iſrael ſuffered, quarrelled with Iephta, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had conteſted with Gideon. Iephta hereupon enforced to defend himſelfe againſt their fury, in the incounter ſlew of them two and forty thouſand,
Iud. 12. which ſo weakened the bodie of the Land, as the Philiſtims had an eaſie conqueſt of them all not long after: Iephta, after he had iudged Iſrael ſixe yeeres, died: to whom ſucceeded Ibzan, who ruled ſeuen yeeres: after him Elon was their Iudge tenne yeeres: in all 2925. 2942. which time Iſrael had peace. Euſebius findes not Elon, whom hee calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approued in his time, this Iudge was omitted.
